Before closing I just want to call attention to the increase provided for an Assistant Attorney-General. I looked into that matter with a good deal of care, and my judgment was that it was not needed in the present condition of the business of the Attorney-General's Office, and I submit the observation to the House, leaving it to the future to verify the prediction, that one of the purposes involved in the increase in that whole Department is connected with the desire to pass the election bill which is now being debated in the House. I say this in the light of a good many other things that have been done since we met here this session, the counting of a quorum in a way in which it was never counted before, the adoption of certain rules, the increase in the power of the judiciary, the taking away of some of the circuit judges so as to leave certain officers to be appointed by the district judges, and the increase in the Attorney-General's Office, an increase which ought not to be made.

Now, I want to call attention to one other matter. There are thirty-six medical examiners provided for in this bill—

A MEMBER. That has been struck out.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Has that been struck out? I could not tell from the reading.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. We struck out the increase as to that matter, and the Senate receded.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Then the matter stands in this way, as I understand: The House passed, under a suspension of the rules, a bill increasing the force of medical examiners in the Pension Bureau; and the additional officers were exempted from the operation of the civil-service law because when the bill was being passed here under whip and spur it was stated there was a large number of applicants whose applications required immediate decision, and that the bureau ought not to be compelled to go on with an insufficient force while awaiting the tardy decision upon the qualifications of applicants under the civil-service law. The bill went to the Senate, where a clause was inserted bringing these additional officers under the operation of the civil-service law, and from that day to this I believe we have never heard anything further in regard to that measure.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I will refer in the first place to the last statement of my friend from Kentucky. As to why we did not make this increase in the number of examiners in the Pension Office, my friend is aware that we have just passed a bill which will increase very largely the work of that office; and the conference committee decided that when the increase is made it should be made with reference to the work to be done, and should be provided for in a separate bill. At present we are unable to determine as to the required number. We went over the ground and we struck out this provision, not because of any determination that the officers were not needed or would not be needed, but because, upon the information we had, the bill I have referred to having just passed, we laid the question aside in order that provision might be made for the appointment of such a number of officers as might be commensurate with the work to be done.

Now, touching the other matter embraced in the remarks of my friend from Kentucky, it is due to the Attorney-General and to the administration of the Department of Justice that I should say my friend is quite in error in supposing that this additional Assistant Attorney-General is provided for with reference to any legislation except such as has been upon the statute-book for six months or a year.

Mr. DOCKERY. Is it not due also to say that there is a larger increase of force in the Attorney-General's Department than in any other Department of the Government?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That may or may not be so. But the question is, not whether there have been large increases, but does the public service require that such increases as are proposed should be made? We are loading the dockets of our courts every day with cases of great consequence to the Government, involving large sums of money; and investigation satisfied us that attorneys of at least fair ability should be employed to represent the Government in contesting those cases, which look to a pretty rapid depletion of the Treasury.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] will yield to me for a moment I wish to say in reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] that instead of there being a large increase in the Attorney-General's Office there is an increase of only one officer—an additional Assistant Attorney-General.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I supposed that my friend from Missouri spoke by the card when he said that there had been a large increase. I did not recall any such increase; but presuming that he had looked into the matter and spoke advisedly, I took it for granted such might be the fact.

But I never concern myself with any question as to whether a measure which I believe is necessary involves an increase of force in any Department of the Government. I am willing to line Pennsylvania avenue with officers of this Government, if their employment is necessary to conduct the business of the Government. I think that in our legislation here too much regard is often paid to the mere question of the number of officers, without properly considering what may be the requirements of the Government. What we should seek is to have the business of the Government properly conducted, whether in the particular case it takes ten men or a hundred. But it appears, as my colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, suggests, the increase in this case involves the employment of only one new officer, and this was provided for with reference to immediate public requirement.

I do not remember whether there was any other matter to which my friend from Kentucky referred.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. That is all.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. There is one other subject on which I wish to say a word. We have deemed it proper that the sense of the House should be taken as to whether the salary of the Commissioner of Public Lands should be increased or not. My friend from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] desires to call the attention of the House to that question.

Mr. CANNON. Before that question is taken up allow me a suggestion. It is important we should finish the consideration of this report this evening, so that the matter may go into further conference, if the House should so decide. It is now five minutes of 5 o'clock. I suggest that my friend from Ohio ask unanimous consent to extend the session until this matter is disposed of; otherwise we must take a recess at 5 o'clock under the standing order.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I suggest that the session be extended until half past 5 o'clock.

Mr. CANNON. Until we finish the conference report.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Not only until we finish the report, but there may be some gentlemen who desire to occupy a little further time this afternoon in discussing the election bill.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I will ask consent that the standing order of the House be so modified as to extend the present session until half past 5 o'clock.

Mr. CANNON. Or until this conference report be finished.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the time for the recess be extended until half past 5 o'clock, or until the consideration of this report be finished. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. DOCKERY. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. CANNON] is in error in his statement of a few moments ago. In the bill as passed by the House the force in the Department of Justice was increased by providing for seven additional officers; and in this report there is a further increase of one officer, so that the increase in the Department is from 101 employees to 109.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The seven additional officers are clerks; I supposed my colleague on the committee referred to attorneys. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON].

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call attention to Senate amendment number 159, line 14, page 68. It is an amendment by the Senate increasing the salary of the Commissioner of the General Land Office from $4,000 to $5,000, and the salary of the Assistant Commissioner from $3,000 to $3,500. And I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I desire to say with reference to that motion, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. CANNON. I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that we first adopt the report of the conference committee, and then on the motion to non-concur the gentleman from Illinois can again make his motion to concur in the amendment to which he refers. But let us have the report adopted first.

Mr. PAYSON. I have no objection to that course, and for the present I withdraw the motion, reserving the right to renew and press it.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Then I move the adoption of the conference report.

The conference report was adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What motion does the gentleman from Ohio now submit?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I understand my friend from Illinois has made a motion to concur in one of the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. PAYSON. I withdrew that temporarily until the formal matters could be disposed of.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Does the gentleman desire now to renew it?

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, as it is now in order, I renew the motion to concur in the amendment of the Senate to which I have referred.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman state the number of the amendment?

Mr. PAYSON. No. 150.

Mr. DOCKERY. What is the purport of the amendment? I ask that it be read by the Clerk for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 68, line 14, strike out all after "office" down to and including "dollars" in line 40, and insert:

"For the Commissioner of the General Land Office, $5,000; one Assistant Commissioner, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall be authorized to sign such letters, papers, and documents and to perform such duties as may be directed by the Commissioner, and who shall act as Commissioner in the absence of that officer, or in case of a vacancy in the office of the Commissioner, $3,500."

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, under the existing law the Commissioner of the General Land Office has a salary of $4,000 a year and the Assistant Commissioner a salary of $3,000 a year. The Senate amendment increases the salary of the Commissioner $1,000, making it $5,000, and $500 additional for the Assistant Commissioner, making his salary $3,500 a year.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is the Senate amendment; and your motion is to concur?

Mr. PAYSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOCKERY. When was the salary of the Commissioner of the General Land Office fixed at $4,000?

Mr. PAYSON. Ever since I have been in public life, but I am not able to give the gentleman the date of the law fixing that as the salary.

Mr. DOCKERY. And it is proposed now to increase it $1,000?

Mr. PAYSON. Exactly.

Mr. DOCKERY. And the Assistant Commissioner $500?

Mr. PAYSON. Yes, that is the proposition I am urging.

Mr. DOCKERY. Very well, that is for gentlemen on that side of the House.

Mr. PAYSON. Now, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SAYERS. I would like to interrupt the gentleman to ask if the duties of the Commissioner of the General Land Office are any more numerous or more onerous now, or whether the duties of the Assistant Commissioner are more onerous than they have been in the years past when that salary was being received?

Mr. PAYSON. Yes, sir; very largely so, and no public official occupying a relative position, except possibly in the office of the Commissioner of Patents, where there has been a percentage, even, of the increase of business such as has taken place in the General Land Office in the past five or six years. This is constantly accumulating, and grows out of the rapid settlement and consequent disposition of public lands in the Western part of the Union as well as the accumulation of business in the office, as also in the efforts to bring up the business of the office to the present time, which was largely in arrears when this Administration came in. There has been a constant increase of the duties of the office in the administration of the public-land service. If gentlemen will take occasion to look into the immense amount of business that is done there, and that has accumulated, they will be astonished at the character of it and the aggregate amount. And may I call attention of the House, Mr. Speaker, briefly to the position of affairs there; the volume as well as the important character of the service?

Mr. HOPKINS. Let me ask my colleague first if increase in the business of the office and the effort to bring forward the current business can not be accomplished by more clerks better than by an increase of the salary of the chief?

Mr. PAYSON. Undoubtedly. Additional clerks have been required from time to time, and are badly needed now. They should be provided; but the duties of the head of the Land Office are exceedingly onerous with reference to the adjustment of the various claims growing out of conflicting interests which come before that office for settlement. The Commissioner of the Land Office is, with regard to this business, a court of original jurisdiction.

Questions of all sorts and varieties come before him in the ordinary course of business of the office, from the most ordinary case, involving a tract of agricultural land, up to a mining claim worth millions of dollars; all questions of right as between claimants, and disputes, are settled before him as a court of original jurisdiction, and the amount of business, upon an investigation of the office, which has been undisposed of up to date, amounts to the startling number of 229,952 cases of different character.

Mr. HOPKINS. How many can be disposed of daily?

Mr. PAYSON. That I am not able to say. It is enough to say that during the first six months of the administration of the present Commissioner of the Land Office something over sixty thousand cases were disposed of, more than were received in the office during that time.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will my colleague allow another question at that point? Conceding the large number of cases pending, does it not require rather a subdivision of the labor than an increase in the salary of the head?

Mr. PAYSON. In one sense, yes; but I am addressing myself principally at this time to the question of the gentleman from Texas, whether the duties of the office are more onerous to-day than at the time the salary of the Commissioner was fixed; and that involves not only the volume, but the character of the business.

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman allow me—

Mr. PAYSON. Allow me to finish this statement first; and to show the condition that the business of the General Land Office was in at that time I desire to call the attention of the House to these figures.

Mr. SAYERS. Does the gentleman think that the addition of a sum of $1,000 to the salary of the chief of the Land Office would enable him to dispatch the business more speedily?

Mr. PAYSON. The present incumbent of the General Land Office is devoting every practicable hour in giving attention to the duties of that office that it is possible for him to do. He is performing his duties with the strictest faithfulness and with the greatest efficiency, as I know, and while I do not say that an increase of salary would add specially to the efficiency of that office since the present incumbent has been there, because he is doing his whole duty, the point that I intend to make when I shall be able to reach it is, that the present Commissioner of the General Land Office deserves more than he is receiving, and more even than the Senate amendment proposes to give him. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] has anticipated what I was about to say.

Mr. HOPKINS. Is not that true of many of the heads of Departments of the Government, and if you start with the Land Commissioner where are you going to stop?

Mr. PAYSON. I am not discussing that, but may say that I shall not stop till I have urged proper payment for efficient service. If I may be permitted to proceed in my own way I will try to answer questions that gentlemen are now presenting to me. The Commissioner of Patents receives $5,000 a year and has received it ever since I have been in public life, as my recollection goes. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue receives a salary of $6,000 a year and has received it ever since I have known anything about that office. The Commissioner of Pensions receives, as I recollect, $5,000 a year. If I am mistaken, I shall be glad to be corrected. And many of the various other bureau officers in the Government receive the salary that this Senate amendment proposes to give to the General Land Office.

Now, the point I wished to make when I addressed the Chair and asked the attention of the House was this: That there is no bureau in this Government that is of greater importance or that requires ability of a more signal character, or the salary to which would be more thoroughly earned if this amendment should prevail, than the office which is filled by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. There is no officer who comes closer to the people, or who in the administration of his office has larger interests to deal with, than the Commissioner of the General Land Office. And I speak upon this advisedly, with knowledge, because I have had an intimate acquaintance with the performance of the duties of that office during the past two Administrations.

And with the constant increase of duties and with the magnitude of the questions which are brought before him for decision, and speaking with a personal knowledge as to the efficiency of the present occupant of that position, I confidently assert that the amount which is provided here is fully earned. If any officer of the Government in charge of a bureau is entitled to $6,000, the present Commissioner of the General Land Office is. I think the amount of business that goes to his hands is not generally realized. With the increase of settlements, the looking over and giving personal attention to the examination and approval of all the contracts for surveys in the great West, the army of Government agents looking after the interests of the United States in the newly settled portions of the country, the fraudulent entries, the timber depredations, and all that sort of thing, come under his personal supervision. The different divisions of the office, particularly the pre-emption division, the mineral division, and the public-land division, are either one of them equal in importance to some of the bureaus of the Government to-day.

I call attention to the condition of the business at the close of the week of April 19 last, from which table, which I submit, a general idea of the volume and character of the business he has in hand may be obtained, and which, to sustain the reputation of his personal administration, he must control and superintend, and, largely, at the termination of each case personally inspect:

Mr. HOPKINS. Yet, I suppose, if my colleague will allow me, all those subdivisions existed under the law during the former Administration.

Mr. PAYSON. Certainly they did.

Mr. HOPKINS. And were properly conducted by the then Commissioner.

Mr. PAYSON. Conducted to the best of the ability of the gentleman who then occupied the office. But a bureau of this character, and presided over by such an efficient public officer as now occupies that position, to say that he ought to be made equal in salary to that of other bureaus which I have named and some that I have not named (for I do not know the salaries of all of them)—it seems to me that it is something that ought to go without saying.

The importance of the bureau of the General Land Office is not appreciated by Congress.

Only those who are by committee assignment or special investigation brought in contact with it know of its real importance.

One of the most difficult duties the President had to perform was to find two gentlemen satisfactorily adapted to perform the duties of these positions. Experience has demonstrated the wisdom of his judgment.

The Commissioner is, as we all know, a courteous gentleman, and energetic; he has Western push and executive force; industrious, and his work shows careful and conscientious exertion; he is a lawyer of eminence, and brought with him a reputation as a judge which has been fully sustained by his decisions, numerous and important, as I know, now of record, rendered since he has been in office.

Remember, as I have said, he sits in all contested cases as a court of original jurisdiction, and every case must be passed on and a formal, written opinion prepared and delivered, many of them presenting questions never presented in the courts, and frequently involving in these later days property worth millions of dollars; questions, too, never presented in the earlier days of more limited Federal power.

This has grown with the growth of the country until the office, in fact, is of sufficient dignity to be treated almost as a Department instead of a bureau.

Any satisfactory Commissioner of the General Land Office deserves this increase and especially does Mr. Commissioner Groff, whom it affords me pleasure to be able to heartily endorse.

My partiality for him is not here expressed because of personal friendship, although I am glad to number him among those to whom I am warmly attached and I believe to the fullest in the doctrine of standing by the interests of those to whom we are so related, but I put my support of this motion on business grounds alone, the high character of the office, the onerous duties it imposes, the varied accomplishments and attainments necessary to successfully perform its work. The personal qualities of character and association needed to make the performance of such duties agreeable to those directly interested in results, as well as to us in public life brought daily in contact with him, all happily united in Judge Groff, constrains me, Mr. Speaker, to urge with whatever influence my words may have, based on a large experience in these matters, as also whatever of personal influence I may have as a member here of years of service, that he be given the benefit of this deserved partiality.

He deserves it, and I only delay the recognition the House will give him, I feel sure, by my occupancy of further time in this debate.

The assistant commissioner deserves the benefit of the Senate amendment. I only regret it is not larger in his case. He brought to the public service here the matured experience of a man of public affairs; an ex-governor of a great Western State, with full knowledge of the needs of the people interested in the office, and an executive ability of which he and we his friends may well be proud.

As acting commissioner, as well as assistant, his record is of the highest. I earnestly hope the Senate amendment will be concurred in by the House.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I only desire to submit a brief statement for the consideration of that side of the House, and when I shall have done so the responsibility rests with them. I am opposed to this increase. When this bill passed the House it carried one hundred and thirty-four new offices at an additional annual expense of about $140,000. It came back from the Senate with one hundred and thirty-one additional offices, the cost of which I have not yet been able to estimate. I do not know the number of new offices that will be established when this bill shall finally become a law, but it is very probable that the new offices created will involve an additional annual expense to the tax-payers of the United States of perhaps $250,000.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in view of the depression prevailing in all branches of business, if gentlemen on that side of the House desire to increase the salary of the Commissioner of the Land Office from $4,000 to $5,000, and the salary of the assistant commissioner from $3,000 to $3,500, in the face of the fact that these salaries have continued for a long term of years at what they are now, then I say the increase will have to be made by Republican votes and against the united protest of this side of the House.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the observations just made by the gentleman from Missouri, I am not aware nor have I knowledge from examination whether there are a number of new officers provided for in the bill or not; but I desire his attention while I say that if a single one of these new officers created by the Senate amendment in this bill is not necessary for the proper administration of the public business, I will join hands with him and endeavor to strike it out.

It is no argument against the bill for a proper increase of salary of a Department official, a public officer, when the needs and duties of his office require it, to say that in the same bill certain new officers are created by Senate amendments which were never provided for by the House; because in the growth of this country everybody knows that there must be new officers created for the proper and efficient administration of the affairs of a country which is growing like this.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I want to say to my friend that my colleague on the committee [Mr. DOCKERY] used the word "offices." There are increases in the number of employees for the dispatch of business where it was falling or had fallen behind. They are not "new officers." I think that is not a proper term to use, but conveys a wrong impression.

Mr. DOCKERY. If the gentleman prefers to use the name "clerk," all right.

Mr. SAYERS. He wants to give the name of the office to the clerk. SILVER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to announce the following conferees upon the bill (H. R. 5381) directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes: Mr. CONGER, Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts, and Mr. BLAND.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PAYSON. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that is all I want to say in regard to the proposition, but I will reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to concur in the amendment which has been reported.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, this officer took this office knowing the salary, and it seems to me that these services have been performed for that compensation for a number of years, and I believe performed during all Administrations with a considerable amount of ability and satisfactorily to the people, and this is a very bad time to make an increase. I can excuse the gentleman from Illinois, who is chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, and of course is associated a great deal with this officer. His relations, on account of his position on that committee, being very close with the officer at the head of that Department, he naturally would have a good deal of sympathy for the man who administers that office.

Mr. HOPKINS. You think he has allowed his friendship and zeal to run away with his judgment?

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. I will not say that much. I have no doubt he believes fully that the salary ought to be increased without regard to his position, but I do not think it is proper. I do not think in the condition of the American people at this time it is proper.

Mr. ENLOE. No doubt about that.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. It is in the interest of the welfare of the country to economize in all these matters. I do not sympathize with the remarks that have been made about increasing the clerks that are necessary for the performance of public business. The people understand that as the nation grows larger and as there is a larger population it will be necessary to increase the number of clerks, but it is not necessary to increase the salaries of officers who are performing these duties; and I hope this side of the House will preserve a good record for economy in regard to these matters. I do not think we have been very extravagant thus far. The record will show when we get through. I know gentlemen on the other side are making remarks to the effect that it will not be as good, but I think we will be able to prove that we have been economical in the administration of the affairs of Government. I hope this salary will not be increased.

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman explain how he will be able to establish that reputation among the people when they have created the office of a new Assistant Secretary of the Navy and have increased the salary of the Commissioner of the Land Office, if this report is adopted?

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. We will not be able to do it should we put this through so far as the Commissioner of the Land Office is concerned. In regard to the increase for an Assistant Secretary of the Navy, I believe that that proposition when it was up here had some very able support on that side.

Mr. SAYERS. Not very many.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. Not enough to carry it through, but it had able support; and, of course, if able men become advocates on that side of the House of this new office, it is to be expected that they will have the sympathy of friends on this side of the House who have control of the appointment. In order that such things may not be done, I have always believed that the minority should be in favor of economy.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is the true mission of the minority.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. They should not only be in favor of economy of the offices, but there should be a proper and efficient service. There should be economy as to the salaries and there should be no unnecessary expenses.

Mr. SAYERS. We are trying to prevent unnecessary expense.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to concur in the Senate amendment which has been read.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Speaker, it is very gratifying to see the disposition of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KERR] to enter at this stage of the session upon the policy of economy. A gentleman who votes here with the facility he does on almost all occasions to give away millions can very well afford—

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ENLOE. Please do not interrupt me. A gentleman, I say, who votes with the facility he does on almost all occasions to give away millions here, can very well afford to come in at this hour with a plea for saving a thousand dollars. I agree with the gentleman that it is a great thing for the American people to save a thousand dollars, because that sum represents the labor of a thousand man for one day, or of one man for a thousand days, and I am glad to see that he recognizes the fact that it is necessary that at some point we should begin to economize. I have been looking for that ever since Congress met. I have been watching the proceedings of this House with a great deal of interest, wondering when we would get to a point when there would be any gentleman on that side who would want to save something for the people. I am glad the gentleman from Iowa has reached that point. He says that gentlemen of influence upon this side of the House have influenced votes upon the other side, and when gentlemen of influence upon the Republican side, like himself, reach a point where they are willing to begin to save a thousand dollars for the people, I hope their example will have the proper effect on this side of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. KERR, of Iowa, rose.

Mr. CANNON. Let us have a vote.

The question was taken on the motion to concur in the Senate amendment, and the Speaker pro tempore declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 47, noes 38.

So the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I move now to non-concur in the other amendments, which relate mostly to increases in the employees of the Senate, twenty-one or twenty-two in number, and involve an increase in the appropriation of about forty or fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word about this matter, because it brings before us the real contest upon this bill between the House and the Senate. As the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] has said, there are probably twenty-two or twenty-three increases of Senate employees provided for in the Senate amendments. There is one assistant clerk to the Committee on Claims, and there are six additional messengers, at $1,440 each. I believe there are about six additional Senators over there, which may account to some extent for the additional messengers. Then there are three additional skilled laborers, at $1,000 each; three additional laborers, at $720 each; an additional clerk to a committee, at $2,100; another additional clerk to a committee, at $1,800; and then, for clerks to Senators who are not chairmen of committees, at $1,800 each, there is the amount of $63,000.

This amendment strikes out the words in the House provision, "during the session," and the aggregate of $21,790 for these clerks in the bill as it went from the House is increased to $63,000. Part of this increase, how much I do not know exactly, but probably four, five, or six of these employees, may probably be due to the increase in the number of Senators, but most of the increase is due to the fact that the amendment provides an annual clerk at $1,800 a year for each Senator who is not chairman of a committee. Heretofore the clerks of Senators have been "during the session." Now, I do not know what may be the temper of the House upon this subject. We have had many contests with the Senate about these clerks in former years—

Mr. DUNNELL. And we have always backed down.

Mr. CANNON. Yes, as the gentleman from Minnesota says, we have always backed down. We have yielded to the claim which the Senate has made that, being a co-ordinate branch of Congress, it is the proper judge of the number and the compensation of the employees required to transact its business. I will not discuss that branch of the question now, but will content myself with the statement that the larger portion of the Senators, I believe all of them but about thirty, are chairmen of committees and that their committee clerks receive an average compensation of over $2,000 a year, some of them having assistant clerks at the rate of about $1,440 a year. I will not criticize the number of committees that the Senate has. I will not intimate that they are too numerous, although it has been intimated that at both ends of the Capitol there are more committee clerks than the respective bodies need for the transaction of their business. However, the Senate has these employees, and in addition there is this appropriation proposed by the Senate for the compensation of annual clerks for Senators who are not chairmen of committees. Now, as members of the House have to hire their own clerical assistance, as we all know, this amendment, viewed from that standpoint, practically gives to the Senators $1,800 a year more salary than is given to members of this House who are not chairmen of committees.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will my colleague permit a question?

Mr. CANNON. In a moment. As I have said, in all the contests that we have had heretofore on this subject, some of which have continued for weeks, the House has receded in the end, because the alternative has been presented either to recede or to let the bill fail. What the House may do on this occasion I know not, but I thought it proper to say what I have said now because to-morrow, I believe, will be the last day of this fiscal year, and if this bill does not pass, the employees carried by the bill will be left without provision on Monday morning next.

Mr. DUNNELL. Monday will be the last day of the fiscal year.

Mr. CANNON. It is suggested that Monday will be the last day, so that we have to-morrow and Monday to agree upon this bill and have it enacted into law. I have had no desire to provoke discussion, but I thought it was well enough to volunteer to call the attention of the House to the main matter of controversy between the conferees of the House and the Senate, the main question upon which we have not agreed and which we have to deal with in conference. I have no doubt that we could have easily agreed upon the whole bill if it had not been for these increases for Senate employees.

My object is that if any member of the House desires to take any step that will bring the two bodies together touching this matter it may be done now, if it is the sense of the House to take such a step.

Mr. HOPKINS. I wish to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill how much more the clerks will receive under this proposed legislation than they have received heretofore.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The change is this: Whereas the Senators have heretofore had session clerks, this makes them annual clerks at $1,800 a year. It is the difference between $21,000 and $63,000.

Mr. ENLOE. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] whether we are to understand from his statement that the House now has the Senate "in a hole"—in a position where it can compel the Senate to agree with the House? Heretofore it seems the Senate has compelled the House to agree with it.

Mr. CANNON. I know of no such distinction between this contest and former contests touching the clerks to Senators. I will remind the gentleman that under the Constitution the concurrence of the House, the Senate, and the President is necessary to accomplish legislation; that heretofore the Senate has always claimed that the regulation of its own force and the pay that shall be given to its own force is a matter pertaining to the Senate, and on that question it has heretofore refused to recede, and the House, yielding to the necessity of passing legislation providing for other expenditures of the Government, has invariably receded.

Mr. ENLOE. Then, as I understand the gentleman, it is necessary that the House should recede or that this bill should fail if the Senate insists.

Mr. CANNON. I have not so said. I have only stated what has been the history of this matter heretofore.

Mr. ENLOE. I want to know what is the power of the Senate in this matter. If the Senate insists, can the House compel the Senate to do anything different from what it has done heretofore?

Mr. CANNON. Well, I do not know what we can do unless we call out the Army. [Laughter.]

Mr. ENLOE. Can you not do that? The majority in this Congress have been able to do everything thus far. Can you not call out the Army?

Mr. DOCKERY. Just a word about the remaining differences between the House and the Senate. It is not, as I understand the issue, a mere difference in regard to the salary of the clerks of Senators. The difference is this: the Senate has increased its clerical roll by the addition of 30 officers. This bill as it went to the Senate provided for 261 employes for that body; it now carries with the pending Senate amendments 291. The bill as returned from the Senate carries in respect to the compensation of Senate employes a total of $57,970 more than it provided when it left the House. The increased number of Senate employes is 30, and the increased amount of appropriations asked is $57,970.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the increase with reference to clerks for Senators is about $26,000. The current law appropriates $36,888 for Senate clerks, while this bill as amended by the Senate carries $63,000. As the House will observe there is therefore still an increase of about $31,000 for Senate expenses in issue and yet to be adjudicated in conference.

Mr. HOPKINS. I wish to ask the gentleman from Missouri this question: Does the Senate attempt to interfere with the clerical force of the House?

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not think they do. But I utterly deny and repudiate that so-called "courtesy" between the two Houses which requires this body to agree to whatever the Senate may determine in respect to the number of its employes and their compensation. We have a right to our judgment in that matter as in other expenditures, and the Senate should exercise a like scrutiny in relation to the expenditures of this House.

Mr. HOPKINS. Has the Senate made any attempt to interfere with the House as to the number of its employes or their emoluments?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. No, they have not. I understand the attitude of the Senate to be this: "You provide such number of employes for the conduct of the business of the House as in your judgment are necessary, and we will do the same; we will not decide for you how many clerks you need, and we think you ought not to assume to decide any such question for us."

Mr. HOPKINS. Is not that a pretty sensible position to take?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. It is only a question as to whether our friends at the other end of the Capitol are abusing their privilege. I do not question the right of the House to say in reference to these expenditures proposed by the Senate, "This is extravagant; this salary is exorbitant," and to call a halt. The question is as to when that line is reached—whether they are making increases beyond what is necessary; and that is a question of fact rather than anything else. I will say confidentially, not to be repeated, that it is the judgment of some eminent gentlemen in another place that they have an unnecessary number of officers on the roll, and that the salaries are in some cases extravagant. So we thought it might not be amiss to go over the roll with them and eliminate the surplus number or reduce the superfluous amount.

Mr. HOPKINS. I desire to say to the gentleman from Ohio that for three or four years past we have been following the lead of these gentlemen on conference committees in regard to this question. They come in here and make their report upon these matters with a good deal of force and gesticulation. We get just about such reports as we get here to-day. Under the lead of these gentlemen the House votes to non-concur in the action of the Senate, but ultimately we have had to abandon that position, to back down; and if we are going to do that now, I for one would rather do it at this time and gracefully than after we have had three or four votes on this proposition and then do it.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the Senatorial argument means a change of the Senate employes, making them annual officers.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The question here presented is a somewhat different one. I am not prepared to say that our friends there will insist upon the full number that they demand, and they do not deny our right to inquire into the matter. So it is only a question how far we shall go in attempting to dictate the number and compensation of their employes.

Mr. HOPKINS. I think we ought to consider this very carefully before we vote to non-concur. If we do so vote, then we ought to stick to it; for I would rather drop out the whole appropriation with all it carries, and see it fail, rather than recede from the position we take on that matter. I do not wish to see year after year the humiliating spectacle presented here that we have had heretofore on various occasions when the House has voted again and again to non-concur and then ultimately receded.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. One of the troubles in regard to this question has grown out of the fact that we recognize the necessity of each member having a clerk, but we do not rush precipitately to vote for that which we ourselves require [laughter]; and we have sometimes assailed the Senate for doing for themselves, and promptly, what we ought to do for ourselves.

Mr. MOREY. I would like to inquire of my colleague from Ohio, as he is a recognized authority on the subject, whether it is not perhaps a proper case for the doctrine of reciprocity.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I think it is, and I am willing to adopt that system if the House will sustain us, and vote for clerks for the members of the House. I have no doubt that the country will sustain it, for it is necessary and just and proper for the transaction of the business. There is not a member on this floor who can be catechised under the civil-service rules and on that examination tell the substance of five bills pending on our Calendars, because he is driven into other matters which he can not refuse to attend to, matters of public concern to his constituents at the Departments. And every member here knows that the only way that our constituents can reach the Departments is through their member of Congress. For that reason it is proper that we should have assistance, because there are duties devolving upon him outside of those which pertain to him as a member of this House.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Let me ask the gentleman from Ohio whether he means by "reciprocity" that we are to let the Senate have clerks provided they will force them upon us, because we do not dare to do it ourselves?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. No; I do not want to be forced, but I am willing to yield very gracefully if it is done. [Laughter.]

Mr. ENLOE. I want to ask the gentleman a question—[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Ohio that the House insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ENLOE. I desired to ask a question of the gentleman, but I suppose I will have to do it privately now.

EVENING SESSIONS FOR DEBATE ON ELECTION BILL.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to ask unanimous consent of the House for a matter connected with its proceedings. I ask unanimous consent of the House that an order be entered for a continuation of the public debate upon the election bill on Monday evening, commencing at 8 o'clock, and that speeches be limited to twenty minutes. I have conferred with gentlemen on both sides, and it is absolutely necessary to make some such arrangement.

Mr. SPRINGER. Does the gentleman propose the House shall take a recess at 5 o'clock?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Say 5.30.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. For debate only?

Mr. BUCKALEW. Yes; for twenty-minute speeches, commencing at 8 o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will submit the request of the gentleman, that the House take a recess on Monday afternoon at 5.30 o'clock until 8 o'clock the evening session to be devoted to debate only on the election bill, the time being limited to twenty-minute speeches.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Can I ask for a session for Saturday afternoon on the same terms?

Mr. SPRINGER. Make that request separately.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Very well.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask that the same order be made for Saturday evening. That the House take a recess at 5.30 until 8 o'clock, the evening session to be for debate only on the election bill, the time to be limited to twenty minutes.

Mr. KILGORE. And the evening session to be limited to half past 10? [Cries of "Oh, no!"]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE, POST-OFFICE EMPLOYEES.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the report of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads on the bill H. R. 10086, passed by the House on yesterday, together with letters from the Department in reference to the same.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The report and letters are as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., May 5, 1890.

SIR: In reply to your request of the 2d instant, relative to House bill 6448, being a bill "granting leaves of absence to clerks and employes in first and second class post-offices," etc., I beg to state that the amended bill, as follows, "Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, that from and after July 1, 1890, clerks and employes attached to first and second class post-offices be allowed leaves of absence, with full pay, for not exceeding fifteen days in any one fiscal year, provided no clerk or employé be granted leave until he has performed service for one year," will not involve an additional appropriation for clerk-hire.

The bill, as amended, strikes out section 2, providing for the employment of substitute clerks at the rate of $600 a year each, and also section 3, making an additional appropriation for clerks in post-offices, and amends section 1 by eliminating the third-class post-offices.

The effect of the amendment, therefore, is simply to authorize leaves of absence, with full pay, to clerks and employés attached to first and second class offices for not exceeding fifteen days in any one fiscal year, provided the clerk or employé has performed service for one year.

Very respectfully,

JOHN WANAMAKER,
Postmaster-General.

Hon. J. H. KETCHAM, Chairman Subcommittee House Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, Washington, D. C.

Mr. KETCHAM, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, submitted the following report, to accompany H. R. 10086.

The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6448) granting leaves of absence to clerks and employés in first, second, and third class post-offices, report therefor a substitute, namely: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert as follows:

"That from and after July 1, 1890, the clerks and employés attached to first and second class post-offices be allowed leaves of absence, with full pay, for not exceeding fifteen days in any one fiscal year, provided that no clerk nor employé be granted a leave until he has performed service for one year."

This substitute for the original bill is approved and recommended by the Postmaster-General, who says in a letter addressed to the committee, dated May 5, 1890, "that it will not involve an additional appropriation for clerk-hire." The clerks in the different Departments of the Government, including the letter-carriers, are, under existing law, granted leaves of absence with pay.

The committee, believing that the same privilege should be given the over-worked clerks and employés in the first and second class post-offices, that the personnel and efficiency of the service will be improved by it, report the bill favorably and recommend its passage.

COMMITTEE ON THE POST-OFFICE AND POST-ROADS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., June 27, 1890.

MY DEAR SIR: During my absence this morning at the opening of the House session, Mr. DOCKERY, of Missouri, asked unanimous consent to recall from the Senate House bill 10086, copy of which I inclose, making assertion that to carry out its provisions it would entail a cost of about $300,000. I shall endeavor to have the legislation acted upon to-day. The report in connection with the bill exhibits your letter dated May 5, 1890, the words "that it will not involve an additional appropriation for clerk-hire." I would be pleased to hear from you at once, as I have no knowledge upon what authority Mr. DOCKERY made statement to the House.

Very truly, yours,

HENRY H. BINGHAM,
Chairman Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Hon. JOHN WANAMAKER,
Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C.

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., June 27, 1890.

SIR: In reply to your letter of even date, relative to House bill 10086, I beg to call your attention to my letter of May 5, 1890, addressed to Hon. J. H. KETCHAM, chairman of the subcommittee of your committee, in which I state that "it would not involve an additional appropriation for clerk-hire" to carry out the provision of the said bill for not exceeding fifteen days' leave for clerks and employés attached to first and second class post-offices.

Very respectfully,

JNO. WANAMAKER,
Postmaster-General.

Hon. H. H. BINGHAM,
Chairman Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TRACEY. I ask unanimous consent to print some proposed amendments on the election law in the RECORD.

Mr. CANNON. Touching what?

Mr. TRACEY. The election bill.

Mr. CUTCHEON. For information only?

Mr. TRACEY. For the information of the House.

Mr. CANNON. The gentlemen in charge of the bill, the chairman of the committee [Mr. LODGE], and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] are both absent.

Mr. TRACEY. I would like to have the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] read the amendments. That is one reason I would like to have them printed in the morning.

Mr. CANNON. Can not that be done just as well to-morrow?

Mr. TRACEY. If it is not done to-night they can not be printed in the RECORD to-morrow morning. The amendments are not long.

Mr. CANNON. They can not be voted upon until next week, so that it will make no difference and you can have them appear in the RECORD Sunday morning.

Mr. TRACEY. There are only three or four lines.

Mr. CANNON. Has the gentleman spoken to the members in charge of the bill [Mr. LODGE and Mr. ROWELL]?

Mr. TRACEY. No, sir.

Mr. CANNON. As the amendments can be printed in the RECORD Sunday morning, and as both of these gentlemen are absent, I should prefer to have the gentleman speak to them first.

Mr. TRACEY. It might improve the bill, I think, if they were adopted.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. RANDALL, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. PICKLER, for two weeks, on account of important business.

To Mr. WICKHAM, for six days, on account of important business.
To Mr. SHERMAN, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the joint resolution (H. Res. 183) to provide for the unexpended balance, $99,430.07, for discharging claims of letter-carriers for extra compensation under the eight-hour law, approved May 25, 1888, and appropriated for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1888.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. 982) to provide for the admission of the State of Wyoming into the Union, and for other purposes, asked a conference with the House on the bill and amendment, and had appointed Mr. PLATT, Mr. CULLOM, and Mr. JONES of Arkansas conferees on the part of the Senate.

APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREES.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment as conferees on the bill (H. R. 9066) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, and for other purposes—Messrs. BUTTERWORTH, CANNON, and FORNEY.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MCADOO. Mr. Speaker, if recognized, I would like to take the floor in the morning on the election bill. I understood that I was to be recognized next, and I would like to take the floor with the understanding that I should resume my remarks in the morning.

Mr. CANNON. This session was extended beyond 5 o'clock for the consideration of a conference report only.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO] does not desire to address the House now; he simply wishes to be recognized to-morrow.

Mr. CANNON. If there is to be a pension session this evening, the House ought to adjourn without further debate.

Mr. SPRINGER. He does not desire to speak now; he simply desires to be recognized.

The SPEAKER. It will make no difference to the gentleman from New Jersey. A recognition now would not hold over a recess.

Mr. SPRINGER. He simply desired to have it understood that he should be recognized to speak first on the bill in the morning.

Mr. KILGORE. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. According to the regular order, the House stands in recess until 8 o'clock this evening, in accordance with the rule of the House.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired the House was called to order by Mr. PERKINS as Speaker pro tempore, who directed the reading of the following communication.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, June 27, 1890.

Mr. PERKINS, of Kansas, is hereby appointed Speaker pro tempore for this evening's session.

T. B. REED, Speaker.

Mr. KILGORE. I have just come in, and I would like to know what bills these are.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Those that were considered two weeks ago, and have come over as unfinished business.

Mr. KILGORE. There was an order made as to each one carrying it into a full House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No; those two as to which that order was made have not been brought up for consideration and will not be.

There are two bills, as the gentleman from Texas will remember, upon which the previous question was ordered, and it was agreed that there should be thirty minutes' debate on those.

Mr. KILGORE. But the bills of the entire session one night were ordered to a full House.

Mr. BAKER. They have all been passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. They were made the special order for a certain day, and that day having passed they were brought up to-night as unfinished business.

Mr. KILGORE. That relates to the bills considered just now?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. They were considered two weeks ago to-night.

Mr. KILGORE. What is the reason they were not disposed of in the regular order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman will remember, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] consented that they might be read a third time, but he did not consent that the previous question should be ordered or that they should be passed that evening; hence no arrangement was made and they were laid aside. They were to be brought up as unfinished business.

Mr. KILGORE. Was it not arranged that they were to be carried into a full House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No arrangement was made as to that.

Mr. KILGORE. That only related to two or three certain bills?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is all, and they have not been brought up and will not be.

Mr. KILGORE. How many are there in that batch?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is one bill here which the Clerk will read the title of—

Mr. KILGORE. Then the question is on the third reading?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. They were all read the third time, and the question is on the final passage of this bill.

Mr. KILGORE. I think they ought to be read by caption.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. They were all read by caption.

Mr. KILGORE. Each one ought to be voted upon separately. That will be a more business-like way than the proposition to vote on the whole batch in bulk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman from Texas insists upon it, they will be submitted again so that he may hear the titles of them when read; but they were all read.

Mr. KILGORE. I do not think it is business-like to come here and read the titles of a great batch of bills and then say that these shall be passed if there is no objection to them. I will not insist upon the reading of the bills, which I could do as gentlemen well understand, but I think it would be a very good idea to submit each one separately; and I make that suggestion just in the interest of business-like methods, and not for the purpose of obstruction.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman from Texas will permit a suggestion, he will remember that at the time these bills were considered some of the reports were read, and all of them were published, so that members have had from that time up to this to examine the reports published in the RECORD; and the Chair submitted them to the House for objection, and there was no objection.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, now, there may be some bill in that lot I would like to cut off. There are some that I should have cut off had not the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] taken the contract.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is one bill here that has not been engrossed for a third reading and read the third time. The Clerk will read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8332) granting a pension to Mary E. Graham.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading as amended. Without objection, it will be so ordered. The Chair hears no objection and the bill will be considered as read the third time. The question is, Shall the bill pass? Without objection, it is so ordered. The Chair hears no objection.

Without objection, the titles to the several bills to which amendments were made will be considered as amended so as to conform to the contents of the bills. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to reconsider the several votes by which the various bills were passed; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRISONERS OF WAR PENSION BILL.

Mr. O'DONNELL. Mr. Speaker, on the 18th of December last there was offered in this House by one of the best friends of the soldier ever a member of this body [Mr. MORRILL], a gentleman who has devoted nearly all of his time and labor to promote their interests, and whose efforts will endear him to all the soldiers of the nation, a bill pensioning prisoners of war. This bill has not yet been enacted into law.

No more righteous bill than this providing for pensioning prisoners of war has been offered in this Congress. The men who passed the ordeal of prison life in the South have richly earned pensions, and the allowance of $2 per day for the time while held captives. The amount is small; it is a pitiable compensation for the suffering they endured.

No one of the noble army of martyrs who lived through those horrors would again serve thirty days of that imprisonment for the largest pension you are likely to vote any of them. The record of the treatment of the prisoners of war is the most mournful of all the chapters of the unhappy history.

Let us, as far as we can, obliterate the fearful recollection. This bill deserves a unanimous vote in its favor. It is a sorry commentary that it has not been enacted long ago. Can it be that prosperity so blunts the finer instincts of patriotism that these men who gave so much for the country are neglected for a quarter of a century by the Government for whose perpetuity they suffered so much? The prisoner of war was faithful to the flag of the Union when that faithfulness cost suffering.

starvation, and nakedness. The moral grandeur of their fidelity to the Government which seemed to forget them in their captivity has never received its full appreciation.

In the crucible of misery they were tried, and were faithful to the flag under which they enlisted. They never knew or thought of any other flag or Government except the banner and Government of the Republic, their love and devotion to which no calamity could weaken; their patriotism and self-denial were exhibited under terrible trials. By a baptism of suffering they became children of the Republic, and no inducement of release from misery, wretchedness, and suffering could tempt them to forget the cause for which they periled all. With them life, liberty, and happiness were freely offered for the Union. They put away the evil genius of selfishness and remained true to their country. Their sufferings and sorrows grew, but instead of faltering they kept the faith, and their patriotism and devotion shine out resplendent.

Never during all that long and terrible struggle was there such a trial of souls by the ordeal of war. Their valor and their heroism should win the homage of history and the gratitude of the American people. Few of us to-day can comprehend the splendor of their resolve, the sublimity of their sufferings, and the granitic character of these captives of the war. Their imprisonment was a gigantic sum of suffering, loss, and grief, with a multitude of deaths. It is impossible to estimate their suffering; it is impossible to contemplate without pitying admiration the fidelity of these men who gave so much without a murmur for the redeemed glory of the flag. That they are unremembered up to to-day shows the speed with which time is pressing back the scenes of the civil war.

The memory of their grand faithfulness the ages should not obliterate. Libby, Belle Isle, Florence, Salisbury, and Andersonville—around these names linger memories of misery. There is no light in the gloom; the poor prisoner of war saw it not; all the hope he gained was from the skies, which were full of pitying sunshine. In the prisons of the South forty-five thousand boys in blue gave up life; around the stockades the bones of thousands of our soldiers molder until the judgment day. It is by the sacrifices of such men that civilization was made worthy of survival, and it survives only by the sacrifice of such great souls. Forty-five thousand died in these prisons that the Republic might live. And if the shadowy hosts could pass in silent review above us they would rejoice if just laws for their surviving comrades in sorrow and suffering were enacted.

What an appeal for justice their ashen lips would utter were speech a gift of the dead! They will look down approvingly if we are just. To pass this bill will soften the memories of the survivors. Few of the mighty array who rode in the hurricane of civil war endured and suffered what these prisoners endured and suffered as they were dragged by the iron chain of necessity.

Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk to be read this letter from a commander of the Confederate forces, taken from the archives of the Confederate government, which but too truly confirms the suffering of the men at Andersonville. This letter mournfully establishes the fact that those who entered there left hope behind:

ANDERSONVILLE, August 5, 1864.

COLONEL: The following additional report of my inspection at this point is respectfully submitted:

My duty requires me respectfully to recommend a change in the officer in command of the post, Brig. Gen. J. H. Winder, and the substitution in his place of some one who unites both energy and good judgment with some feeling of humanity and consideration for the welfare and comfort (so far as is consistent with their safe-keeping) of the vast number of unfortunates placed under his control; some one who at least will not advocate deliberately and in cold blood the propriety of leaving them in their present condition until their number has been sufficiently reduced by death to make the present arrangement suffice for their accommodation; who will not consider it a matter of self-laudation and boasting that he has never been inside of the stockade, a place the horrors of which it is difficult to describe, and which is a disgrace to civilization; the condition of which he might, by the exercise of a little energy and judgment, even with the limited means at his command, have considerably improved.

I am, colonel, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. T. CHANDLER,

Assistant Adjutant and Inspector-General.

Col. R. H. CHILTON,

Assistant Adjutant and Inspector-General, C. S. A., Richmond, Va.

And now I close the fearful chapter by asking that this order, also taken from the records, be read:

[Orders, No. 12.]

HEADQUARTERS CONFEDERATE STATES MILITARY PRISON,

Andersonville, July 27, 1864.

The officers on duty and in charge of the battery of "Florida artillery" at the time, will, upon receiving notice that the enemy have approached within 7 miles of this post, open fire upon the stockade with grape shot, without reference to the situation beyond these lines of defense.

It is better that the last Federal be exterminated than be permitted to burn and pillage the property of loyal citizens, as they will do, if allowed to make their escape from prison.

By order of John H. Winder, brigadier-general.

W. S. WINDER,

Adjutant-General.

I present these testimonies of the inhumanity to the prisoners at Andersonville, not to revive the recollections of the hateful and terrible period, but for the purpose of exhibiting to you what these men who ask a slight recompense for their suffering endured. I would not recall that fearful period in our nation's history. This neglect by Congress of these devoted soldiers may well challenge the attention of the student of human affairs, who will marvel at such ingratitude on the part of any nation. The hour for justice has long since gone by; it should be deferred no longer. These surviving prisoners of war are growing old; the awful experience that was theirs has left the ineradicable impress of suffering. With too many, adversity sits an unwelcome guest at their hearthstone. To enact this bill into law will, I know, in many instances, light up the whitened faces of hunger and despair.

Every member should, and I believe will, vote for this bill. We will thereby do a moiety of justice to these suffering patriots, who have up to this date only received the neglectful attention of Congress. By this they, if possible, will forget the past. The transforming and renewing hand of time is hiding away from the memory of men the scenes of those wretched days. We seek to continue the rebuilding of the country. With us the war is the skeleton of the past, smiling peace the genius of the present. We bind up the nation's wounds, care for its defenders, pursue the conquests of peace, and thus "close the last furrow of war, extinguish the last prejudice, efface the last vestige of hate."

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills under the special rule for Friday evening sessions.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. KERR, of Iowa, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, and the Clerk will report the first bill.

W. ZISTER.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7614) granting a pension to W. Zister.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of W. Zister, widow of Frank Zister, Company H, Twenty-seventh Missouri Volunteer Infantry.

Mr. KILGORE. I insist upon the reading of the report.

The CHAIRMAN. The report will be read.

The report (by Mr. TURNER, of New York) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7614) granting a pension to Waldeburga Zister, submit the following report:

That the claimant is the widow of Frank Zister, late a private in Company H, Twenty-seventh Missouri Volunteer Infantry; that the soldier suffered ever after his discharge from chronic diarrhea, which greatly debilitated him. This continued up to 1882, when he died of cancerous stomach. H. C. Dalton, attending physician, says in affidavit that he was suffering from diarrhea when admitted to hospital, and that this may have been the cause of the soldier's disease.

This claim was rejected in the Pension Office on the ground that the soldier's death was not the result of army service.

Your committee believe that there is sufficient doubt in the case to warrant favorable action on the bill. The claimant is old and very poor, and the committee recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CORNELIA A. STANLEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 563) for the relief of Cornelia A. Stanley.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act there be paid, out of the naval pension fund, to Cornelia A. Stanley, widow of the late Rear-Admiral Fabius Stanley, United States Navy, the sum of $50 per month during her widowhood, the same to be in lieu of her present pension.

The report (by Mr. MARTIN, of Indiana) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 563) granting a pension to Cornelia A. Stanley, submit the following report:

This bill was reported favorably by the Senate Committee on Pensions, which report is adopted by the majority of this committee and is in the following words, to wit:

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of Cornelia A. Stanley, have examined the same and report:

"The claimant is the widow of Fabius Stanley, who died on the 5th of December, 1882. She was married to him January 5, 1861, his former wife having died previous to 1833.

"Fabius Stanley was appointed a midshipman in the Navy December 23, 1831, and was promoted from time to time and became a rear-admiral February 12, 1874, and died of angina pectoris, which originated from exposure in the line of duty.

"This claimant filed a declaration for a pension February 28, 1883, and was allowed a pension at the rate of $20 per month, May 10, 1883, from February 28, 1883, and now asks an increase to $50 per month.

"In view of the long and faithful service of Rear-Admiral Stanley, and the amount allowed to widows of officers of like rank, we approve this application, and recommend the passage of the bill."

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CORNELIA R. CHANDLER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1992) to increase the pension of Cornelia R. Chandler.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to increase the pension now allowed by law to Cornelia R. Chandler, widow of the late Rear-Admiral Chandler, from thirty to fifty dollars per month.

The report (by Mr. TURNER, of New York) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1992) granting an increase of pension to Cornelia R. Chandler, submit the following report:

That the claimant is the widow of the late Rear-Admiral Chandler, a distinguished officer who served continuously from 1845 till his death, in 1889, when he died from sun-stroke while on duty in Japan.

The claimant is fifty-seven years of age, and has no other means of support than her pension of $100 per month and the income of a small property, not exceeding $2,500. She has one minor son and a minor daughter, both of whom are to a considerable degree dependent on her for support. In view of the distinguished services of her late husband, the age and financial condition of the claimant, and the numerous precedents for such legislation, your committee favorably report the bill with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. KILGORE. I did not understand, Mr. Chairman, the reading of the report exactly, but I think it read that the beneficiary of that bill is already receiving a pension of $100 a month.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill proposes to raise the amount of the pension from $30 to $50 a month.

Mr. COBB. What was said about income in that report? I think there was something said in the report about her now having an income of $100 a month.

Mr. KILGORE. Perhaps the report had better be read again.

The report was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. There is evidently a mistake in the report, and, if there be no objection, the bill will be laid aside without prejudice.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I move that it be laid aside without prejudice, retaining its place on the Calendar, as there is evidently some error in regard to the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the bill will be laid aside without prejudice, retaining its place on the Calendar.

There was no objection.

Subsequently,

Mr. TURNER, of New York, said: Mr. Chairman, having come into the Hall somewhat late, I am informed that House bill (H. R. 1992) to increase the pension of Cornelia R. Chandler was temporarily laid aside on account of some apparent discrepancy between the report and the bill. I ask that the case be taken up again.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the bill will be taken up again.

There was no objection.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. What amount of pension does this lady now receive?

Mr. TURNER, of New York. Thirty dollars.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. The report says she is now receiving a pension of $100.

Mr. TURNER, of New York. That is an error of the printer's. Her present pension is only $30 a month. The report has been badly printed—I suppose owing to the peculiarity of my handwriting.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Another reason the bill was objected to was that from the language of the report it might be inferred that this lady enjoys an income of $2,500 a year, when in fact that is the total amount of her property.

Mr. TURNER, of New York. That is what I intended to state.

A MEMBER. What pension does the bill propose to pay?

Mr. TURNER, of New York. Fifty dollars.

The report as corrected was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1992) granting an increase of pension to Cornelia R. Chandler, submit the following report:

That the claimant is the widow of the late Rear-Admiral Chandler, a distinguished officer who served continuously from 1845 till his death, in 1889, when he died from sun-stroke while on duty in Japan.

The claimant is fifty-seven years of age, and has no other means of support than her pension of $30 per month and the income of a small property valued at not exceeding $2,500. She has one minor son and a minor daughter, both of whom are to a considerable degree dependent on her for support. In view of the distinguished services of her late husband, the age and financial condition of the claimant, and the numerous precedents for such legislation, your committee favorably report the bill with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM P. WITT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5585) granting a pension to William P. Witt.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William P. Witt, late of Company B, Seventeenth Regiment of Kansas Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5585) granting a pension to William P. Witt, submit the following report:

Claimant enlisted July 13, 1864, as sergeant of Company B, Seventeenth Regiment of Kansas Volunteers, for the term of one hundred days. Claim for pension rejected in the Pension Office because of claimant's inability to prove origin and connect present disability with service.

Claimant states that he was taken sick at Camp Curtis, near Leavenworth, Kans., with camp diarrhea. Two of his comrades testify to his sickness at Camp Curtis, and the physician who was called to treat him immediately on his return from the service states that he (claimant) was seized with liver complaint and yellow jaundice, with finally rheumatism supervening, and had quite a protracted and serious confinement for six weeks or more.

The board of examining surgeons at St. Joseph, Mo., under date of July 9, 1884, report claimant entitled to one-half rate of pension.

Your committee are of the opinion that soldier contracted the disease from which he now suffers while in the service of the United States and in the line of duty. He is clearly entitled to a pension, and we therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HENRY G. HEALY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 789) granting a pension to Henry G. Healy.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Henry G. Healy, late lieutenant-colonel of the Sixty-fifth New York Volunteers, at the increased rate of $50 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 789) granting an increase of pension to Henry G. Healy, submit the following report:

That the facts are clearly set forth by the Senate report, which is adopted by this committee. The report is as follows:

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill granting an increase of pension to Henry G. Healy, have examined the same and report:

"This claimant enlisted as captain in the Sixty-fifth New York Volunteers, was promoted to the rank of major, which grade he held on the incurrence of the disabilities for which pension is claimed. Subsequently he was promoted to and mustered as lieutenant-colonel and then to colonel.

This claimant is in receipt of a pension at the rate of $35 per month by reason of disability from gunshot wound of back and total deafness of left ear and sense of sight, being pensioned for the total rate, for the rank he held in the service at the time of the incurrence of the pensionable causes. The Commissioner of Pensions on application for increase refused to favorably consider the same, for the reason that under the existing law that rate for several disabilities can not be combined further than to allow total rate for the rank held at the date of incurrence. From this decision the soldier appealed to the honorable Secretary of the Interior, who, in affirming the decision of the honorable Commissioner of Pensions, makes use of the following language:

"He is entitled to $35 per month for the deafness alone, and is rated at total for his rank as major for the gunshot wound of the back. It therefore appears that in the absence of either one of the pensionable causes he would still be entitled to the rate he is now receiving for the other. Prior to the passage of the act of August 27, 1883, increasing the rates of pensions for deafness, he was in receipt of $35 per month, by reason of other disability (gunshot wound of the back); consequently no benefits were derived by the soldier from the passage of said act.

"The soldier has exhausted all of his rights and remedies under the general law; i. e., under existing laws he can not receive any higher rating than $25 per month for the disability existing and resulting from the pensionable cause. "The evidence filed shows the soldier to be totally and wholly incapacitated for the performance of any and all manual labor and that he is entirely dependent on his pension for support and maintenance; that during more or less of the time each year he is confined to his bed, under the care of a physician, needing attention, and that he is dependent on those not legally bound to support him. That we are of the opinion that this degree of disability and helplessness is directly attributable to his army service, and in connection with the fact that he is entirely without property or income from any source and without the physical ability to earn one, we recommend that the bill do pass."

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

THEODORE GARDNER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2733) granting a pension to Theodore Gardner.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Theodore Gardner, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month, in lieu of that which he now receives.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2733) granting a pension to Theodore Gardner, submit the following report:

That the Senate report clearly sets forth the facts in this case and is hereby adopted. The Senate report is as follows:

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2733) granting a pension to Theodore Gardner, have examined the same and report:

"A similar bill was introduced in the last Congress, and was favorably reported, which report is adopted and is as follows:

"Theodore Gardner, late sergeant of the First Battery, Kansas Volunteers, was pensioned under special act, approved June 13, 1873, at the rate of $8 per month, for double scrotal hernia. The rating now under the pension laws, as shown by Digest, page 309, for double scrotal hernia may be from $12 to $17 per month.

"The pensioner made application for such increase under provisions of general law, and his application was rejected under section 5 of the act of July, 1882, which provides: 'That no person who is now receiving or shall hereafter receive a pension under a special act shall be entitled to receive in addition thereto a pension under the general law, unless the special act expressly states that the pension granted thereby is in addition to the pension which said person is entitled to receive under the general law.'

"As the act under which the soldier was pensioned fails to state that his pension therein granted was in addition to that which he would be entitled to receive under the general law, he asks for the passage of this act in order that he may receive the increased rating now granted for like disability to pensioners under the general law.

"It is apparent that the present rating is not as much as he is entitled to in his present condition, and also that his disability is increasing."

"The bill is reported favorably, with a recommendation that it do pass."

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARIAH L. POOL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 798) granting a pension to Mariah L. Pool.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mariah L. Pool, an army nurse during the late war of the rebellion, and pay her a pension of $12 per month.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 798) granting a pension to Mariah L. Pool, submit the following report:

That the Senate report clearly sets forth the facts and is hereby adopted. The Senate report is as follows:

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 798) granting a pension to Mariah L. Pool, have examined the same and report:

"This bill proposes to grant a pension to Mariah L. Pool, an army nurse, at the rate of $12 per month. Miss Pool entered the service under the direction of Miss D. L. Dix, in October, 1862, and was assigned to duty in the Hammond General Hospital, Point Lookout, Md., and remained there over a year, and was given permission to return to her home to recuperate her health. She is now seventy years of age and an inmate of a home for aged women in California.

"We recommend the passage of the bill."

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY KINNEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 820) granting a pension to Mary Kinney.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary Kinney, an army nurse during the late war of the rebellion, and pay her a pension of $12 per month.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, that seems to be a very plain case, and, unless some gentleman objects, I suggest that the reading of the report be omitted so as to save time.

Mr. COBB. I object.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 820) granting a pension to Mary Kinney, submit the following report:

That the Senate report in this case is adopted. The report is as follows:

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 820) granting a pension to Mary Kinney, have examined the same and report:

"A careful examination of the papers accompanying this bill shows that Miss Mary Kinney was commissioned in 1861 by James E. Yeatman, president of the Western Sanitary Commission and duly authorized agent of Miss D. L. Dix; that she was regularly detailed for hospital work at Corinth, Miss., and Memphis, Tenn., under Dr. Irving. She served as directed, and we recommend the passage of the bill."

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. KILGORE). The question is upon laying this bill aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. COBB. I am not very familiar with the pension laws and I desire to inquire whether there is any general law for pensioning army nurses.

Mr. MORRILL. There is no such law. The only way of pensioning them is by special act.

Mr. COBB. Then, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that we ought to hesitate about passing bills of this character.

Mr. SHIVELY. Because there is no general law?

Mr. COBB. Yes.

Mr. SHIVELY. If there was a general law we would not need to pass special acts.

Mr. COBB. Because there is no general law covering a whole class, is it right or proper that we should take up special individuals in that class and pension them from time to time by these special acts? If army nurses ought to be pensioned as soldiers are pensioned, why not pass a general law to that end and not have each one of these nurses who supposes that she is entitled to have a pension coming here for a special act? I shall not object to the consideration of this bill, but I will ask a vote upon it.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman had had the same experience on the Committee on Invalid Pensions that some others have had he probably would not have made the remarks he has just made. We have for months been carefully considering the question of a general bill for pensioning army nurses, but so far we have been utterly unable to frame a measure which would not let in a large class of persons who are not deserving, and we have thought it better to take up each individual case, examine it carefully, and report favorably only those which we have found meritorious, than to pass a general act which would necessarily include a large class of non-meritorious cases.

Upon examination of the records at the War Department it has been found that a large number of women were employed in the Army; some as cooks, some as laundresses, some as matrons in hospitals, and we have been unable to frame a general bill for nurses which would exclude those, because the records were not kept in such a manner as to show definitely what the duties of these women were. Finding ourselves unable to frame a satisfactory general law, we have preferred to take up and report those cases that we believe to be meritorious and ask the House to act upon them in this way by special acts.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] does not object to this bill being reported to the House favorably.

Mr. COBB. I will not object.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MAGGIE STAUFFER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 798) granting a pension to Maggie Stauffer.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Maggie Stauffer, an army nurse during the late war of the rebellion, and pay her a pension of $12 per month.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 798) granting a pension to Maggie Stauffer, submit the following report:

That the Senate report clearly sets forth the facts and is hereby adopted. The report is as follows:

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 798) granting a pension to Maggie Stauffer, have examined the same and report:

"Miss Maggie Stauffer was appointed a nurse under the authority conferred upon Miss D. L. Dix, and her certificate of appointment bears date February 17, 1863. She was discharged from the service May 24, 1865, by reason of 'discontinuance of hospital.' On the back of her discharge, J. M. Study, surgeon, in charge of Adams General Hospital, Memphis, Tenn., under date of May 31, 1865, says:

"Miss Maggie Stauffer has been connected with this hospital for more than two years, during which time she has performed her duties in the most satisfactory manner. Miss Stauffer I consider a lady in every sense of the word, and therefore most cheerfully commend her to the favorable consideration of any whom it may concern."

"We recommend the passage of the bill."

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LUCY A. COFFIELD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1729) granting a pension to Lucy A. Coffield.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Lucy A. Coffield, an army nurse, and pay her a pension of $12 per month.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1729) granting a pension to Lucy A. Coffield, submit the following report:

That the Senate report sets forth the facts in this case, and is hereby adopted. The Senate report is as follows:

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1729) granting a pension to Lucy A. Coffield, have examined the same and report:

"The claimant under this bill is now seventy-three years of age. She was matron in Van Buren Hospital, at Milliken's Bend, La., from April, 1863, to August, 1863. Mrs. M. A. Hickendyke, in an affidavit dated December 17, 1889, swears that Lucy A. Coffield was a good and faithful nurse, and gave satisfaction both to the medical director and the surgeon in charge of the hospital. Her health was completely broken down by the arduous duties attending her hospital work in that unhealthy climate.

"Your committee feel justified in recommending the passage of the bill."

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. M. A. HOOPER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 786) granting a pension to Mrs. M. A. Hooper.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. M. A. Hooper, widow of Charles Hooper, deceased, late captain of Company A, Seventh Regiment New Hampshire Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 786) granting a pension to Mrs. M. A. Hooper, submit the following report:

That the facts in this case are clearly set forth in the Senate report, which is hereby adopted. The report is as follows:

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 786) granting a pension to Mrs. M. A. Hooper, have examined the same and report:

"The husband of the claimant under the bill was captain of Company A, Seventh New Hampshire Volunteers, who was pensioned for gunshot wound of right shoulder, at $15 per month. After his death, which occurred from congestion of the lungs, his widow made application for continuance of pension. This was rejected on the ground that 'the soldier's death from congestion of lungs was not due to the gunshot wound of right shoulder, as alleged.'

"Dr. J. F. Graham, who attended Captain Hooper in his last illness, states under oath:

"He was laboring under very severe engorgement of lungs at times from the effects of a gunshot wound received, as I verily believe, in the service. The ball had passed through the upper part of the chest, penetrating upper part of lung. I prescribed for him frequently from that time until his death. Soldier was a man of sober and temperate habits, and his disability was not aggravated in the least by intemperance. Said Charles Hooper died of pneumonia, which was rendered fatal in consequence of said wound. It is my judgment that said soldier's death was caused by said wound, and that he would have recovered had it not been for said wound."

"As between the somewhat speculative judgment of the medical director of the Pension Bureau and the practical judgment of the attending physician as to the point of connection between the soldier's wound and his death, the com-ralties feel impelled to be governed by the latter; and they therefore report the bill favorably and recommend its passage."

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LUCY I. BISSELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 707) granting a pension to Lucy I. Bissell.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Lucy I. Bissell, an army nurse during the late war of the rebellion, and pay her a pension of $12 per month.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 707) granting a pension to Lucy I. Bissell, submit the following report:
As the Senate report clearly sets forth the facts in this case, it is hereby adopted. The report is as follows:

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 707) granting a pension to Lucy I. Bissell, have examined the same and report:
"The papers accompanying this bill show the claimant was regularly appointed hospital nurse of the Twenty-second Regiment Illinois Infantry July 13, 1861, and performed her arduous duties faithfully. Henry Dougherty, colonel of the Twenty-second Illinois, certifies that Miss Bissell, even under most discouraging circumstances, has been unwavering and faithful in the performance of her duties, and that she has never received any pay from the Government or otherwise. A flattering testimonial is given by John C. Norton, assistant surgeon, United States Volunteers, in charge of general hospital No. 3, Paducah, Ky., under date of September 24, 1863. Her appointment by Miss Dix, and assignment to duty at Benton Barracks, Mo., February 28, 1864, and her transfer to Jefferson Barracks July 25, 1864, completes the record; and we recommend the passage of the bill."

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARTHA F. WEBSTER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 763) granting a pension to Martha F. Webster.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Martha F. Webster, widow of Lewis Webster, late Lieutenant of Company K, Sixteenth Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 763) granting a pension to Martha F. Webster, submit the following report:
The facts in this case are clearly and fully set forth in the Senate report, which is hereby adopted. The report is as follows:

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 763) granting a pension to Martha F. Webster, have examined the same and report:
"The claimant under this bill is the widow of Lewis Webster, deceased, late first Lieutenant of Company K, Sixteenth Regiment of Michigan Volunteers. The soldier enlisted on the 6th day of November, 1861, and was honorably discharged on the 8th day of December, 1862. In a formal application for pension, he alleged that he contracted chronic diarrhea and indigestion at or near Yorktown, Va., in May, 1862, and that at the seven days' fight near White Oak Swamp, on the march and during the night, he received a fall which caused a compound rupture.
"The Commissioner of Pensions rejected the claim on the ground 'that the alleged dyspepsia existed prior to enlistment,' and the claim for chronic diarrhea on the ground that it was due to the alleged dyspepsia and not to his military service."

"The claim for alleged double hernia was also rejected on the ground that the reports from the records of the War Department and the evidence obtained by a special examination of the case fail to show origin or existence of the same in the service and line of duty. Since the introduction of this bill, however, the Commissioner of Pensions has caused a careful re-examination of the claim, and has concluded to allow the claim for hernia from the date of filing the original application, February 4, 1882, to March 22, 1883, the date of the death of the soldier.
"The soldier died of paralysis, and under the opinion this result was caused or due to army service. The committee recommend the passage of the bill."

Mr. HILL. I wish to inquire what amount of pension this bill will carry.

Mr. MORRILL. Seventeen dollars if the soldier was a first lieutenant; $15 if he was a second lieutenant.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY J. FOSTER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 770) granting a pension to Mary J. Foster.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary J. Foster, widow of Milton S. Foster, late a private of Company A, Fifth Regiment Kansas Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 770) granting a pension to Mary J. Foster, submit the following report, as adopted by the Senate:

The claimant in this case is the widow of Milton S. Foster, of Company A, Fifth Kansas Cavalry, who enlisted August 4, 1861, and was discharged April 20, 1865. In her declaration for pension she declares that her husband contracted catarrh in the service and died therefrom December 16, 1872. The case was rejected on the ground that the soldier's fatal disease was consumption, and it was not proven to have been due to his military service. The prisoner-of-war records show that he was captured at Marks Mills April 26, 1864, and released at Red River Landing February 28, 1865. The Assistant Surgeon-General United States Army reports that no hospital records of the Fifth Kansas Cavalry were ever on file in his office, so the claimant is unable to show by the hospital records the incurrence of the disease in the service.

A. Thomas testifies that Foster was a strong, healthy man at the time of his enlistment, and that the exposure and hardships of his prison life were the main cause of his injury, which afterwards resulted in his death; that he knew him after the war, and that his constitution was completely broken down.

Other witnesses testify to his robust health at the time of his enlistment, and that he was broken down in health at the time of his discharge.

The evidence submitted to your committee seems to establish the fact at the time of his discharge from the service that he was suffering from catarrh in the head, which gradually increased until the bones of his face began to decay, and until, as one witness testifies, it seemed as though the whole inside of his head was rotten.

His death was caused by consumption, which your committee are satisfied was the natural sequence of the diseased condition of his head, and they therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

FRANCIS E. SMITH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1577) granting a pension to Francis E. Smith.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Francis E. Smith, late Lieutenant of Company H, Fifteenth Regiment Kansas Volunteer Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1577) granting a pension to Francis E. Smith, submit the following report:

That the Senate report clearly and fully sets forth the facts in this case, and is therefore adopted. The report is as follows:

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill granting a pension to Francis E. Smith, have examined the same and report:

"This claimant was enrolled as a private August 1, 1863, and was mustered into the United States service October 12, 1863, at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., as second Lieutenant of Company H, Fifteenth Regiment Kansas Volunteer Cavalry. On April 11, 1881, he made application for a pension, alleging that he 'contracted rheumatism and bronchitis at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., about September 1, 1863.' The claim was rejected by the Commissioner of Pensions on the ground 'that the claimant was dishonorably discharged from the military service on account of inefficiency and neglect of duty, as shown by the records of the War Department.'

"The claimant alleges further that while on duty at Fort Larned, in the State of Kansas, he was entirely disabled from the performance of duty, and while under order of his captain he was sent home to Chase County, Kansas; the disease continued in connection with pulmonary complaints contracted at the same time and place; that he was in the hospital at Fort Riley, Kans., about March, 1864, and at Fort Larned, Kans., about July, 1864.

"Fred P. Drew, acting assistant surgeon, United States Army, in a certificate dated Fort Riley, Kans., March 7, 1864, states that after a careful examination of Second Lieut. Francis E. Smith, of Company H, Fifteenth Kansas Cavalry, he finds him suffering from chronic bronchitis, accompanied with aphonia and in consequence is unfit for duty.

"Henry Penrod, of Lyon County, Kansas, swears that he first knew Francis E. Smith in the year 1861, in Lyon County, Kansas, at which time he appeared to be an unusually strong and robust man, and never knew or heard of said Smith being sick or complaining before he went into the Army; that he saw said Smith at different times during the war, and never heard him complain in any manner until the latter part of 1863; that he saw him on his return from the Army; he was then unable to do hard work; that he has known him ever since, and that he has often been incapacitated from business.

"The reputation of this affiant is officially vouched for as good by the postmaster at Emporia, Kans.

"S. E. Yeaman, of Chase County, Kansas, swears to an acquaintance commencing in 1858; that he was an unusually strong and robust man, and corroborates fully the affidavit of Mr. Penrod. Yeaman is vouched for as a reliable man by the postmaster at Eldorado, Kans. Col. Samuel N. Wood, a resident of Topeka, Kans., swears to an acquaintance commencing in 1859; that he worked for affiant and lived in his family, and was in good health; saw him daily until May 14, 1861, when affiant entered the Army; returned home in August, 1862, and knew claimant intimately until his enlistment in the Fifteenth Kansas Cavalry in 1863; he did not have rheumatism or bronchitis at that time; knew nothing of his physical condition after his enlistment until in July or August, 1864, when he came home from the Army; he was at this time suffering from rheumatism, and had a dry, hacking cough and physically was in bad condition. In answer to an office letter, the postmaster at Topeka, Kans., says: 'Mr. Wood's reputation is good.'

"John E. Dietrich, private, swears that he knew claimant prior to his enlistment and that in his belief he incurred rheumatism and bronchitis as alleged.

"J. E. Mann swears that from 1858 or 1859 to 1864 the claimant was an unusually strong man; that in 1864 was in the same company and that Smith was unfit for military duty and had to be hauled part of the way, on account of rheumatism.

"The widow of Moses Lacy swears that her husband treated said Smith professionally during the year 1855.

"Dr. J. W. B. Howett swears to treatment of said Smith during the year 1866 'for rheumatism and bronchial difficulty.'

"Dr. W. A. Carmack swears that he examined F. E. Smith in June, 1866, and found him afflicted with bronchitis complicated with aphonia, and have treated him frequently for the same from 1866 to the present date, December 2, 1881.

"Medical examinations held at Emporia, Kans., under date June 7, 1882, rate him for rheumatism at one-fourth total, for bronchitis at one-fourth total, and for varicose veins at one fourth total. Under date August 27, 1884, same board rates him for rheumatism and bronchitis at one-half total. The board at Independence, Kans., under date of January 19, 1887, rates him for rheumatism at one-half total, and for bronchitis at one-half total.

"A careful review of the facts here presented show conclusively that the claimant was a sound man prior to his enlistment; that during his term of service he was afflicted as alleged, and at the time of leaving the Army he was in such a physical condition as to be unfit for the performance of duty. Continuance is abundantly shown, and your committee feel justified in recommending the passage of the bill."

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN K. EVANS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 776) granting a pension to John K. Evans.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John K. Evans, late lieutenant Company C, Second Eastern Shore Maryland Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 776) granting a pension to John K. Evans, submitted the following report:
The Senate report very clearly and fully sets forth the facts in this case, which is adopted by this committee.

SENATE REPORT.

The claimant, John K. Evans, entered the service of the United States as second lieutenant of Company C, Second Regiment Eastern Shore Maryland Volunteers, October 2, 1861, and was honorably discharged October 28, 1864. On April 12, 1884, he made application for pension, and in his declaration he alleges:

"That at Falling Waters, Md., about July, 1863, he accidentally fell down the side of the mountain, fracturing his right leg above the knee."

The War Department reports "no record of the alleged disability." Alexander Winsome and John W. Whittington, comrades, testify to incurment of the alleged disability as set forth by claimant. Their presence at the time is verified by adjutant-general, and credibility established. Corporal John R. Webb, comrade, swears to incurment as alleged, "from information and knowledge gained at the time." His presence is verified by adjutant-general and fair reputation.

Isaiah Drake, M. D., swears to an acquaintance with claimant of about six years:

"First knew him in 1878, and treated him during the summers of 1878 and 1879 for fracture of the right leg and knee; his leg was ulcerated and discharging a great deal of pus, and the scent was very offensive; claimant's general health was not good; he was very feeble, the wound in his leg was very much inflamed, and he seemed to suffer the most excruciating pain. * * * Affiant can't give dates of treatment for the reason that he never charged soldiers for his professional services, and made no entries in his books and received no pay, and don't expect any. During period of treatment claimant was totally disabled; for about two years after affiant discharged him he was able to perform about one-eighth of an able-bodied man's labor. At the time his knee was totally stiff."

George W. Neville, M. D., became acquainted with claimant in 1873. Can't say he treated the soldier:

"Looked at his leg several times, and prescribed for him several times: Diagnosis: A fracture of right of femur, affecting the knee-joint, also necrosis of the right femur; it discharges a very offensive pus, causing him great pain, incapacitating him for manual labor entirely one year, and indeed greatly disqualifying him all the time for manual labor."

R. P. Jump, M. D., swears to an acquaintance with claimant from 1863 to 1873, and was an intimate friend; does not know when he enlisted, but so far as his knowledge goes he was perfectly sound before the war.

"Treated him from 1866 to 1873; first treatment was for neuralgia near right knee, which, in opinion of affiant, was caused by gunshot wound. The pain was often so severe that he could not perform labor of any kind for days at a time. Often used hypodermic injections of morphia, which would give temporary relief. * * * thinks claimant was disabled for the performance of manual labor one-fourth of the time."

Dr. Cooper, the regimental surgeon, in response to an office letter, states:

"Have no recollection of any injury of any moment sustained by claimant; * * * thinks was certainly not fractured, or he would have had some recollection of it."

The board of examining surgeons at Newton, Kans., May 21, 1884, "consider his disability equivalent to the loss of a limb, and rate him at third grade."

On June 26, 1885, Special Examiner A. M. Legg gives it as his opinion "that the claim is meritorious," and recommends further examination.

Rodney Chipp, special examiner, says there is evidence to show that there was a serious injury to leg and the existence of running sores prior to the service, and that they would not take him in one company owing to his sore leg; also existence of sore leg in service prior to date of alleged incurment. Hereafter the evidence of incurment in the service as of very little value, as each of the witnesses had a synopsis furnished him by claimant, which set forth exactly what claimant wanted. The examiner is of the opinion that there is no merit in the claim. This special examination, which embraced seventeen witnesses, whose testimony was mostly favorable to the claimant, developed four or five witnesses, and one of them a brother of claimant, who swear very positively to an injury prior to enlistment, which resulted in a sore leg and a running sore; and upon this adverse testimony the examiner reached his conclusion, as above stated.

John F. Fitzpatrick, special examiner, concludes his report by expressing the opinion "that claimant was injured and had a sore leg prior to enlistment, and recommends that the claim be rejected instantly;" and on November 29, 1886, the Commissioner of Pensions rejected the claim on the ground that the injury to right leg existed prior to his enlistment, as shown by evidence obtained during a special examination.

This soldier served a period of three years in the Army, was a good soldier, and notwithstanding the adverse testimony developed by these special examinations, and no hospital record except a furlough to go home after the alleged injury to his knee, to-day he is wholly unable to perform manual labor.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DOBSON AMICK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 448) granting a pension to Dobson Amick.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Dobson Amick, of Texas County, Missouri, a teamster in the late war, who was wounded three times and disabled.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 448) granting a pension to Dobson Amick, submit the following report:

That the Senate report clearly sets forth the facts in this case, and is hereby adopted. The Senate report is as follows:

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 448) granting a pension to Dobson Amick, of Texas County, Missouri, a teamster in the late war, have examined the same and report:

"That it sufficiently appears from the evidence that the claimant was a teamster in the employment of the Government in the year 1865.

"That while on the road driving his wagon in a train loaded with Government supplies for Springfield, Mo., then in the possession of the United States forces, on the 8th of March, 1865, while on duty, a detachment of the enemy fired from the woods near Sand Springs, on the road from Raleigh to Springfield, and shot said Dobson Amick three times. One bullet entered the right side, passed through, and came out at the left side of his chest; one in the right arm, and one in the right hip, which went into the body, and is the most serious. The claimant was hauled to the nearest United States hospital, and was there treated by a surgeon of the Army for six weeks.

"He recovered from his wounds, but was not able to do any further duty. The disability from his wounds has been ever since, and yet continues, such as to disable him from manual labor."

"This claim has been rejected by the Pension Office for the reason that the general law did not include teamsters as enlisted men in the service. We are of the opinion that this man incurred all the risk of a soldier in battle while in line of duty, and that he has suffered from wounds received in the cause if not in the technical military service of the country, and we therefore recommend the passage of the bill."

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

J. M. STEVENS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1735) granting a pension to J. M. Stevens.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of J. M. Stevens, late private Company A, Forty-ninth Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1735) granting a pension to J. M. Stevens, submit the following report:

John M. Stevens enlisted in Company A, Forty-ninth Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, on the 19th day of August, 1861, and was discharged on a surgeon's certificate of disability March 7, 1862.

On October 10, 1883, he made formal application for pension, alleging that at Camp Griffin, Virginia, in September, 1861, he contracted malaria by camping in a swamp, and claims pension for general debility resulting from such cause, and in a subsequent declaration, filed March 25, 1886, he alleges rheumatism in October, 1861, at Lewinsville, Va.

Robert Martin testifies to prior soundness, and also states that after the war he knows of the poor health of the claimant.

Thomas Dehaas swears to an acquaintance with Stevens since 1864, and that he was not able to do more than one-fourth of an ordinary man's work. * * *

He was constantly complaining of poor health.

John Toynbee considers Stevens almost entirely unable to do manual labor. * * *

Would not give him his board for what he is able to do.

William O. Stearns swears that Stevens "is unfit to do manual labor. * * *

Complaining all the time."

Dr. S. R. B. Wilson states "disability istotal." Dr. J. Q. Eggleston states that he is probably unable to perform any manual labor during the colder seasons of the year, and during the summer perhaps one-fourth. J. B. Armstrong, examining surgeon at Gardner, Kans., reports his disability at three-fourths. The board at Ottawa, Kans., under date of March 7, 1888, rates him at seven-eighths.

The claimant was a sound man at enlistment; he has been in miserable health ever since his discharge from the Army. He is in extreme poverty, and we recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES E. KABLER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 773) granting a pension to James E. Kabler.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of James E. Kabler, late a private in Company I, Tenth Regiment Kentucky Cavalry Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 773) granting a pension to James E. Kabler, submit the following report:

That the facts in this claim are clearly and fully set forth in the Senate report, which is hereby adopted. The report is as follows:

A similar bill passed both Houses of the Fiftieth Congress and failed to become a law by reason of the veto of the President. The facts are fully set forth in the accompanying report.

REPORT.

James E. Kabler, the claimant under this bill, enlisted as a private soldier in Company I, Tenth Regiment Kentucky Cavalry Volunteers, on the 10th day of August, 1862, and was discharged September 17, 1863.

On May 18, 1870, he made application for pension, alleging in his declaration "that on December 7, 1862, at Ashland, Ky., he contracted quinsy of the jaws and throat, caused by exposure while in the line of duty."

The claimant swears "that the quinsy has affected his whole system, causing him to break out in sores over his body, and while so broken out he is unable to perform manual labor. These spells occur in the spring and fall and lay him up one or two months each time, and that he has been disabled one-half since discharge;" * * *

"that he is unable to furnish further medical testimony."

The Surgeon-General reports him sick November and December, 1863. Dr. J. F. Fleming, regimental surgeon, swears to treatment of claimant for an affection of the throat, of the nature of quinsy, from September to December, 1862.

Lieut. George L. McCord swears that claimant contracted quinsy of the jaws and throat by reason of exposure at Ashland, Ky., December, 1862.

Dr. R. Wells swears that claimant was free from disease when he entered the service, and that he has treated him for quinsy of the jaws and throat from September, 1866, to March 29, 1871.

F. F. Asbury and B. F. Henderson swear that claimant suffered from and was afflicted with quinsy of the jaws and throat from the time of his discharge to September, 1866, and is suffering from the same at the present time.

Dr. Shackelford, medical examiner, rates him, under date of November 10, 1870, at one-fourth.

Dr. Gaston Boyd, Newton, Kans., April 1, 1874, finds "no disability."

Comrade Robert Cooper swears that he knows claimant had quinsy of the throat and jaws at date of discharge, as he was a messmate of claimant and has personal knowledge of the fact. This is corroborated by Comrade Mason Cooper.

Dr. Henry Owens and P. A. Medlin, Wichita, Kans., swear to an examination of claimant, and find him suffering from an affection of the throat and jaws, which disables him one-half from the performance of manual labor, and that they believe his disability to be the effects of quinsy.

Drs. R. Wells and Nathan Wells, same as above.
 Joseph E. Willis, Henry Vandewarker, and Josiah Porter, neighbors, testify to continuance; * * * that he is frequently confined to his bed, * * * and totally incapacitated for the performance of manual labor one-fourth of the time, * * * and that his condition is such that he ought not to labor at all.

On December 21, 1881, he was examined by the Wichita board, who report "no disability from that cause" (quinsy). Dr. James R. Duncan, medical examiner, Newton, Kans., March 21, 1883, says:

"The claimant is partially incapacitated for obtaining his subsistence by manual labor * * * and that the disability is probably permanent, * * * and in obedience to special instructions he rates only for quinsy one-fourth."

The Commissioner of Pensions rejected the claim August 25, 1882, on the ground of no disability, due to results of quinsy, on account of which pension is claimed, since date of soldier's discharge.

The testimony shows that the disability was contracted in the service and its continuance clearly established; he is now poor and scarcely able to earn a support for himself and family, and we therefore report the bill favorably, with the recommendation that it pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

THEODORE M. PIATT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1284) granting a pension to Theodore M. Piatt.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Theodora M. Piatt, widow of Benjamin M. Piatt, late a captain and assistant adjutant-general of United States Volunteers, in the sum of $50 per month.

The report (by Mr. YODER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1284) granting a pension to Mrs. Theodora M. Piatt, submit the following report:

This or a similar bill was favorably reported in the Fiftieth Congress, and your committee adopt the same report, as follows:

Benjamin M. Piatt, husband of Theodora M. Piatt, enlisted in the late war in 1861 as a volunteer, and was appointed assistant adjutant-general with rank of captain in the volunteer army on the 15th of May, 1862; promoted brevet major and major March 2, 1865, and honorably mustered out November 22, 1865.

Entered the regular Army as second lieutenant in the Forty-fourth United States Infantry, Veteran Reserve Corps, because not able to accept appointment of first lieutenant in the Twenty-fifth Regiment (active); promoted July 2, 1867, first lieutenant by brevet "for gallant and meritorious services in the battle of Chancellorsville," and to captain by brevet "for gallant and meritorious services in the battle of Gettysburg." Major Piatt seems to have been a great sufferer from a lame leg and general ill-health, and was a great sufferer after he was retired, and finally his mind gave way and in a moment of mental aberration he committed suicide on the 17th day of April, 1885, leaving a large and helpless family.

In his application for retirement we glean the following facts in regard to his disability. He says:

"I have had from my birth a slight lameness in my leg and foot. This lameness never materially disqualified me for active exercise of almost every sort, and until after a long, severe, and extremely debilitating sickness in 1862, my ankle joint never had the weakness it now has. Upon entering the volunteer army I was able to walk 10 or 15 miles a day without the use or necessity of a cane or any sort of assistance, and I believe I could do the same to-day but for the effects of what I have suffered in the service. I walked at fourteen months old, and was employed in my father's business (farming) as long as I remained at home.

"In the month of July, 1862, at Winchester, Va., I was prostrated by a violent attack of fever, accompanied by severe rheumatism, and was ill from that time until the latter part of August, when, believing myself able to return to duty, and being very anxious to join my brigade commander at Bull Run, I left Alexandria, Va., with a regiment of infantry and a battery of artillery that were under orders to report to General A. S. Piatt, then commanding a brigade in General Sturge's division. I went with these troops, I think, on the 1st of September, notwithstanding my great weakness and debility, as far as Fairfax Court-House, where we met the army. We remained near Fairfax that night, and I was for many hours exposed to terrible storm of rain that fell that night. The next morning I was very ill, but did not stop until I found General Piatt and reported to him the troops I was conducting. We then went to Fort Corcoran, or near it, and from there, after several days of severe illness and pain, I was sent away on sick leave on account of the relapse caused by the exposure to which I had been subjected in my weak condition.

"I was absent nearly a month and returned again to duty, but was still weak, and suffered much pain in my ankle and leg, and, in fact, in all of my limbs and body, but being a mounted officer I was able to perform the usual routine of duty pertaining to my position.

"At the battle of Gettysburg my horse was shot under me, and I was considerably bruised by the fall, besides which I received several other slight injuries during the battle that I believe still affect me in the use of my foot. I remained on duty in the field, except as herein mentioned, through 1862, 1863, up to about the 1st of May, 1864, taking part during my field service in ten battles, of which the following is a list: Manassas Gap, Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, Beverly Ford, Gettysburg, Wapping Heights, Auburn, Kelly's Ford, Locust Grove, and Mine Run.

"In the spring of 1864 I was relieved from duty in the Army of the Potomac and assigned to duty on staff of General Rosecrans, Department of Missouri. Having disposed of my horses before leaving the field, I had a good deal of walking to do after going to St. Louis, and instead of being able to walk, as I had done before the war, I found the tendons of my leg and foot much contracted, and that I could not walk any considerable distance without both pain and fatigue, almost the entire weight being thrown forward and to one side, upon the ball of the little toe, causing the foot to give way under me at every step, just as it does now, or nearly so. The contracting of the tendons and muscles is, I think, at least a fact.

"The leg has diminished considerably in circumference and I can scarcely estimate the loss of strength or power; certainly it has not one-fourth the action and strength it had when I entered the volunteer army, as at that time I could walk more than four times the distance without a cane that I can now with one, and in addition could walk then free from pain, whereas my foot now becomes tired and sore, and besides my leg and foot are both extremely sensitive to the cold and when thoroughly chilled are almost as powerless as if in a state of paralysis. Believing that I have a just claim to be retired I have submitted this statement. I am now hopelessly lame for life, a condition I believe to be due to my sufferings and labors in the service of my country, in whose behalf I am ready, whenever the necessity may arrive, to lay down my life."

A. Sanders Piatt, late brigadier-general of volunteers, testifies that he has known Benjamin M. Piatt ever since he was seven years old, and up to the time of his enlistment in the Army. Prior to that time he was able to walk 10 or 15 miles a day without difficulty, which he often did on hunting and other excursions. He believes the hardships and exposures of active service in the field have disabled and permanently injured the said Benjamin M. Piatt.

Benjamin R. Runkle, brevet colonel, United States Army, testifies to substantially the same state of facts, as does also H. C. Borden. Dr. M. H. Harding, the family physician of the soldier's father, says he has known Major Piatt for twenty-five years, and although always slightly lame from an early period, he was comparatively active in the discharge of his father's business, and before the war of 1861 never used or seemed to need the use of a cane in walking.

F. W. Egan, colonel Fortieth New York State Volunteers, in concluding his report of the battle of Gettysburg, says of Major Piatt:

"Too much can not be said of this brave and gallant officer; always cool under the most trying circumstances, and by his courage and example he afforded services that were of infinite value in restoring order to my command. When his horse was shot under him he still remained in the van, always by my side, greatly distinguishing himself by noble conduct."

There are a large number of letters from army officers, generals, colonels, etc., all showing that the soldier was an exceptionally brave and efficient officer.

The following is an extract from official Army Register for January, 1885: Retired from active service, Piatt, Benjamin M., 3d July, 1867. Brevet captain, July 2, 1867. Disability in line of duty (act August 3, 1861).

Miss Bell F. Hopkins testifies as follows:

"I have resided in the family of the late Maj. Benjamin M. Piatt for the last ten years or more. He was during all that time an exemplary husband and father, with a heart full of kindly impulses for everybody. He lived one of the purest lives, his habits being without the least irregularity and remote as could be from intemperance in every form. His right leg from hip to foot was perishing away, weakening this limb to such a degree that it was very difficult for him to get about upon it. He could walk but a short distance, say five or six squares, without becoming so fatigued as to be obliged to take a car or other vehicle. The limb was very sensitive, and at times quite painful, and was the source of much annoyance to him, frequently disturbing his usually amiable temper and causing some irritability of speech and mind."

"In the latter part of the year 1884, in passing down one of the stairs at the Gibson House, Cincinnati, he tripped and fell to the bottom, a distance of several feet, striking his forehead, over one of his eyes, on the marble floor. He remained unconscious from about 7 p. m. of that day until the next morning. The fall was a heavy one, as the major weighed over 220 pounds, and the forehead, face, and eye were black. From the effects of the fall he never entirely recovered. The side of his face on which he fell was withering away as a result of the fall, and he showed evident signs of softening of the brain. In my opinion, the fall, which was due to the enfeebled and sensitive limb, striking as he did upon his head, did more to cause the condition of mind which resulted in his death than any or all other causes or agencies. After this fall and up to the time of his death, he complained of being dizzy and light-headed."

The affidavits of a large number of his neighbors who knew him long and well are to the effect that the major was a man of the highest order of morals, that his conduct was exemplary and strictly temperate, and that he was an ardent advocate of temperance.

He was on the retired list and had not applied for a pension at the time of his death, and no application to the Pension Office has since been made by his widow, as, owing to the manner of his death, she had no hope that an application would be favorably acted upon, and she therefore appeals directly to Congress for the relief she thinks she is justly entitled to.

After a careful consideration of the case, the committee are of the opinion that the death of the major may reasonably be considered to have been the result of the injuries to his limb received while serving in the Army, and in line of duty. In view of the long and valuable services the deceased soldier rendered the Government in its hour of need; the fact that he was retired for disabilities incurred in the Army; the needy condition of his family, and all the incidents leading up to the tragic end of the distinguished soldier, the committee are of the opinion that the relief asked for in the bill ought to be granted.

We therefore submit a favorable report and recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. COBB. What is the pension at present paid in this case?

Mr. YODER. There is no pension at the present time. This widow can not get a pension under the general law because her husband committed suicide.

Mr. COBB. What would have been the pension of the soldier?

Mr. MORRILL. That would depend upon the disability.

Mr. COBB. The gentleman is acquainted with the disability. I ask him what would have been the rating of this soldier if pensioned—$50 a month?

Mr. MORRILL. I suppose it would, as he is stated to have been insane and helpless.

Mr. COBB. The report does not say that he was insane, except as insanity may have been evidenced by suicide.

Mr. MORRILL. It says that in a fit of insanity he committed suicide.

Mr. COBB. I would like to know what the rate of pension reasonably would have been if this soldier had himself applied for a pension—whether the rate proposed to be paid to the widow is in excess of what he himself would have been entitled to receive. [A pause.] Mr. Chairman, as I can not get any information about this case, I will object to laying the bill aside.

Mr. YODER. I desire to give the gentleman all the information I can. I have the report here and I am examining it to ascertain what was the rank of this soldier, because upon that would depend the rate of pension. He was, I believe, acting brigadier-general by brevet. If a colonel, he would have received a pension of $30 a month. The bill proposes to pay the widow $50 a month, which, under the circumstances, I think is not unreasonable. This soldier rendered very valuable service. He belonged to the noted Piatt family, distinguished as soldiers and patriots. This man during his insanity sacrificed all his property, leaving his widow destitute with children dependent upon her.

Mr. CARLISLE introduced this bill. The beneficiary lives in Covington, Ky. I am acquainted with all of the facts and know the family. Besides that, there is warrant for this exception, if it be an exception to the law. There was a bill passed awhile ago giving a widow $50 a month, the widow of a rear-admiral. I think if the gentleman from Alabama knew the facts, or only had time to read the report, he would not object.

Mr. COBB. I do not propose to make any objection to these bills, nor would I do so in a spirit of captiousness in any case, but—

Mr. YODER. If the gentleman will allow me, there is another thing I wish to state. There was a little technicality which prevented this widow from getting a pension in the office. If she had done so she would have gotten arrears, back to the close of the war, from the date of the death of her husband, for a number of years, which would have given her five or six thousand dollars in a lump sum. She does not get that in this bill at all. She only gets the pension fixed in the bill after its passage as long as she remains his widow.

Mr. COBB. The reasons prompting me to interfere here in regard to this bill, are these: I believe whenever an officer or an officer's widow is petitioning here for a pension or for an increase of pension, that as a general rule you find they do not have much difficulty in securing it. We seem to take it as a matter of course that they ought to be pensioned or that their pensions ought to be increased upon application. But when the private soldier applies there is always somebody to object, and I have never been able to understand myself why there should be this broad distinction between the man who bore the heat and burden of the day, who did the greatest amount of service, who endured the greatest hardships, and those who during the war, while they rendered undoubtedly valuable services, were comparatively free from the extreme hardships or privations of it, and often to a certain extent from its dangers. As between these two classes I do not understand why we should discriminate in favor of the one who did not do the hard work.

Mr. FLOWER. I desire to make a statement in behalf of my colleague, now Senator CARLISLE, who is a very careful and prudent man in legislation. This is his bill, and I vote for it because I know he would not present a bill unless he believed as a lawyer that the party was justly entitled to the relief asked upon the face of it. That is the reason I am for it.

Mr. COBB. That is a poor reason.

Mr. FLOWER. Well, it is a good reason for me.

Mr. YODER. Another reason, if the gentleman will allow me, is that we recognize rank in these matters.

Mr. COBB. I understand that.

Mr. YODER. And that is the reason we make a distinction even in general bills.

Mr. COBB. I understand that, and I am not objecting on the principle running through the pension business. But when we come to the matter of special legislation, when there is no general law upon which the pension can be granted, there is a principle of equity, it seems to me, that comes up and should govern our action, and whenever this special legislation is asked for this equity ought to be considered, especially when the amount of pension is to be increased above that which the soldier himself would have received, if he lived, under a general enactment.

Now, I am not objecting to this pension simply that it is higher than pensions are usually given; but the information I desired to arrive at is whether or not there is an effort made here to pension this widow at an amount to which she would not be entitled equitably. That is all. She can not claim more than her husband would have received under the general law according to his rank, if no exception had been made in his case.

Mr. HEARD. And that could not have been over $30 a month.

Mr. COBB. And that, as stated by the gentleman from Missouri, could not be over $30 a month.

Now, why pursue this course of legislation? As I remarked awhile ago, it is true, I understand distinctly, that all rank must be preserved whether we wish it or not; and yet it remains indubitably true that applications on the part of privates for pension are not listened to with the same degree of consideration that we bestow upon the officers. We are apt, when such applications are made on the part of the officers, to say as a reason for the increase that the pension already received is not sufficient to support the family in proper style, as though we were granting a pension on the idea of complete and absolute support by the Government of the pensioner. I do not understand that to be the underlying idea of pension legislation.

I understand it to be only an aid extended by the Government to the recipient of it, not intended to relieve him of the necessity of active effort on his part at all. I think we ought to consider these circumstances and say whether or not a certain amount of aid extended would not be all that the Government could reasonably be required to give. Hence my inquiry as to the amount of pension this bill carried.

Now, I move to strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty."

Mr. YODER. I would ask leave to withdraw that bill until I can consult Senator CARLISLE about it.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection, the bill will be informally laid aside, not to lose its place on the Calendar.

There was no objection.

ELMORE E. EWING.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4935) to increase the pension of Elmore E. Ewing.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Elmore E. Ewing, late a lieutenant of Company A of the Ninety-first Regiment of Ohio Volunteer Infantry, war of 1861, to $30 per month, in lieu of the pension now received by him.

The report (by Mr. YODER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4935) to increase the pension of Elmore E. Ewing, having considered the same, report as follows:

The claimant enlisted as a private in Company A, Ninety-first Ohio Volunteers, on the 31st day of January, 1862; was promoted to second lieutenant Company K, of said regiment, June 25, 1863, and to first lieutenant of said company to date August 14, 1864, and was mustered out of the service December 4, 1864.

He was severely wounded in battle, in the line of duty, at Winchester, Va., July 24, 1864. The wound is described by surgeons as follows:

There is a constant oppression in the lung and he is subject to hemorrhages. Any attempt to labor causes nervousness and sleeplessness, and in ascending stairs he suffers severe pain in the region of the heart. As he grows older his disability increases, and, in the opinion of your committee, he is fairly entitled to the pension provided in the bill, and we therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

This claimant's pension has been increased from $10 to $17. At different periods until now he received the full amount allowed for his rank for total disability. His disability is liable to cause death, and it was rejected in the Pension Office because he could not be allowed increase on account of his dangerous condition.

Mr. COBB. This is another case of increase when, according to the report, the pensioner is already receiving the full amount allowed by the general law for total disability; and there is no reason given in the bill why it should be increased.

I dislike to object to the consideration of such cases; and yet it seems to be almost a mockery of legislation to talk about considering special pension acts here; and whether this case ought to be objected to or put to a vote I am doubtful.

Mr. YODER. Let me state to the gentleman that I know the facts in this case. This man is crippled and in bad condition.

Mr. COBB. This is another of the cases reported by you?

Mr. YODER. Yes, sir.

Mr. COBB. Very well; I will not object, but simply ask a vote upon it.

The question being taken, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with favorable recommendation.

CHARLES W. KRIDLER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2804) to increase the pension of Charles W. Kridler.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, directed and authorized to increase the pension of Charles W. Kridler, late private of Company A, Fifteenth United States Infantry, to $50 per month.

The report (by Mr. YODER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2804) to increase the pension of Charles W. Kridler, submit the following report:

Charles W. Kridler was a private in Company A, Fifteenth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry; he enlisted September 3, 1861, and was discharged May 16, 1863, by reason of a gunshot wound in the right leg at Pittsburgh Landing, April 7, 1862; his leg was subsequently amputated; his certificate of disability shows that claimant was discharged by reason of disease of the right leg, following gunshot wound. An attempt was made to save the limb, which resulted in the necessity of amputation.

After his discharge he was pensioned in 1865 at $8 per month, which was increased from time to time until at the present time he is receiving a pension of $36 per month.

The condition of the amputated limb and disease in the hip joint, from which he is suffering, is described in the medical certificate by the board of examining surgeons who last examined him, as follows:

"There has been an amputation of the right thigh exactly 7 inches below the lesser trochanter of the femur; the stump is very tender on pressure; there is a tender, depressed, and adherent cicatrix on the posterior aspect of the stump 2 inches wide and 8 inches long, extending from the end of the stump upwards; there is an open sore the size of a five-cent nickel on the inner aspect of the stump just below the right groin; he can wear an artificial leg and has done so for several years; the amputation is not so near the hip joint as to prevent the use of one."

In regard to wearing an artificial leg the claimant says:

"The wearing of an artificial leg irritates the stump and causes a sore on the inner side of it, which gathers and discharges pus three or four times a year, and whenever it does so I can not wear my leg."

The condition of the left leg, resulting from blood poisoning and gangrene in the amputated limb, and abscess in the left hip, are certified to by his family physician. Dr. R. W. Hall, his family physician, says:

"I know that he was an able-bodied man at the time of his enlistment in September, 1861, healthy and free from disease. I have known him ever since his return in summer of 1863 from service, at which time he had lost a leg and part of the thigh. He has always suffered from the effect of the injury to his right leg. He stated that he had gangrene in it previous to its amputation, and his appearance and character indicate that he has suffered from blood poisoning. He has never enjoyed full health since."

"I have prescribed for him many times and have been his physician during all the time. He had varicose veins of the left leg when he returned, and as they gradually grew worse until it resulted in indolent ulcer, which he has supported for thirteen years past, and at times seemed to require almost amputation of the leg to protect his life, but with rest and treatment it got somewhat better, until he commenced to use it again, when it broke out afresh."

"This condition has resulted in debilitating his system until it has seriously affected his lungs, which completely disables him; in fact, he has been unable to do manual labor of any kind for some years. He also suffers from deafness in the left ear, which he says was contracted in the service. He is now completely unfit to do any manual labor whatever, and entitled to full disability." Under the present law this man can only receive $36, by reason of the doubt that exists in the minds of the medical department in the Pension Office as to whether the disease of the left leg is the direct result of the injury to the right leg. His application for increase, owing to the deplorable condition of his left leg, has, therefore, been rejected by the Pension Office.

In the opinion of your committee this man is entitled to $72 per month; but inasmuch as there seems to be some doubt as to the cause of the disease of the left leg, in the opinion of your committee this man is clearly entitled to at least $60 per month, as the bill provides. He is poor and in destitute circumstances, and at the most can live but a short time. He is now partially supported by charity, and suffers untold agony; and after a careful investigation of his condition your committee is of the opinion that this is a meritorious claim, and recommend that the bill pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

NORMAN B. PRATT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7285) granting a pension to Norman B. Pratt.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Norman B. Pratt, late private in Company A, of the One hundred and fiftieth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, on the pension-roll, subject to all the provisions and limitations of the pension laws of the United States.

The report (by Mr. YODER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7285) granting a pension to Norman B. Pratt, submit the following report: Norman B. Pratt, late a private in Company A, One hundred and fiftieth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, enlisted May 2, 1864, discharged June 27, 1864.

This man was perfectly sound and healthy when he entered the Army. J. W. Smith, the surgeon of the soldier's regiment, testifies:

"I was surgeon of the One hundred and fiftieth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry in the late war and have some memoranda of the disability of that regiment. By reference I find N. B. Pratt, a private in Company A, was discharged from service because of rheumatism June 27, 1864; I may also say I have personal remembrance of this case, the man and his illness."

Capt. Thomas S. Paddock, the captain of the soldier's company, testifies in an affidavit on file:

"I knew Norman B. Pratt prior to his enlistment. I never heard of his having rheumatism, and I believe that at the time of enrollment he was a sound man. At Washington, D. C., he was taken down with rheumatism in a severe form, and after a number of weeks in hospital he was discharged. Since the war I have met Pratt often and he has always complained of his rheumatism and looked and acted like a man afflicted in that way."

Mr. J. B. Haimes testifies: "I was acquainted with Norman B. Pratt, the claimant, prior to enlistment; I saw him very frequently, and knew him to be a moral, upright man, temperate and truthful, and he always appeared to be in excellent health, in fact, a person in every way far above the average. I do not believe it probable that he could have suffered from rheumatic trouble and we not know it, as our town is small and if a person is sick the whole neighborhood was likely to be informed of it."

"Mr. Pratt was prominent and well known amongst the people of the village, and I think it likely that I would know it if any such fact had existed."

W. T. Weelock testifies:

"I knew Norman B. Pratt well before he enlisted, and I never knew of his having rheumatism prior to his service in the Army."

Charles B. Marble and J. J. Cameron testify that they were both well acquainted with the soldier prior to enlistment, and that he was a sound, healthy man.

This soldier filed his claim for pension December 26, 1866, which was rejected August 1, 1867, upon the ground that the alleged rheumatism existed prior to claimant's enlistment in the United States service. Notwithstanding all the favorable evidence in the case, there seems to have still been a doubt as to the origin of the disease. There is no question, in the opinion of your committee, that the soldier contracted the disease in the service, and that he is still suffering from it.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. HILL. I would like to inquire how much that bill carries.

Mr. YODER. It simply applies the provisions and limitations of the pension law. No amount is stated. He will be entitled to whatever pension his disability would entitle him to under the general law.

Mr. HILL. I notice that the report does not state the evidence upon which the conclusion of the Pension Office is based that his disability was incurred prior to his enlistment. I infer there must have been some such proof, or else they would not have come to that conclusion, although the report states that the facts seem to be favorable to the claimant. I notice also that this claimant appears to have been in the service only about two months; if I caught the reading of the report correctly, I think he enlisted in April, 1864, and was discharged in July, 1864.

Mr. YODER. The gentleman who introduced this bill and looked up the case is not present, and I am not very well posted with regard to it.

Mr. HILL. I wish you would have that bill laid over until another evening.

Mr. YODER. I would ask the gentleman to withhold that request until we can listen to the report again, to refer to the reason why the claim was rejected.

Mr. HILL. It states that it was rejected upon the ground that his disability, rheumatism, accrued prior to his enlistment, and there is no evidence set forth in the report upon which that conclusion is based.

Mr. YODER. Let me say to you that the fact that the Government accepted a man after a thorough examination, which they all had to undergo, and got his services and accepted them, and found a disability afterwards, and charged it with having been pre-existing prior to the enlistment, is always received with a great deal of doubt by the Committee on Invalid Pensions. The fact that the Government have accepted him as a sound man and afterwards come in and deny him a few dollars, long after the circumstances have occurred and when the evidence is hard to get at, leads the committee to resolve the doubt in favor of the claimant. In this case I remember now there was conflicting evidence, and there was a special examiner went there and some people remembered it one way and some remembered it the other. His claim was rejected on that technical question of doubt.

Mr. CASWELL. The law presumes that he was sound when he went into the service.

Mr. YODER. No, sir; the law presumes that he was lame and unsound, unless he proves the contrary.

Mr. CASWELL. I say the law presumes that he was sound.

Mr. YODER. They construe it that he was disabled and crippled, unless he can prove the contrary, notwithstanding the examining surgeon swore at the time he was sound.

Mr. CASWELL. They should not do that. I agree with you upon that, and I say the law steps in and says that every man is presumed to have been sound.

Mr. HILL. Of course that would be the presumption in the absence of proof to the contrary, but here was proof to the contrary and that proof is not set forth in the report. If it was an ordinary case of a man serving three or four, or even one or two years, I should not raise the point.

Mr. CALDWELL. Could not the man be disabled in two months just as well as in a year?

Mr. YODER. I remember the case now, and there was proof submitted to the committee which showed that the man was sound prior to his enlistment.

Mr. HILL. I really feel as if there was not sufficient before this committee to-night to enable us to discuss this matter intelligently, and I desire that the bill be laid aside for future consideration.

Mr. OWENS, of Ohio. I ask that the report be read again for information, or else that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HILL] have the report to examine to see if he will not be satisfied, and then it may be called up afterwards. Perhaps he will not then insist upon his objection.

Mr. COBB. The facts as I gather them from reading the report are simply these: This man was in the service a few months. He was discharged and went out of the service. He was examined by the Pension Bureau, and from the proof before the pension officers it was decided by them that his disability was incurred before he entered the service. The subsequent examination was confessedly unsatisfactory. It left the case in doubt. Now, the committee say this doubt, if it exists, ought to be given to the claimant instead of giving it to the Government. I do not understand that to be the rule.

When a man asks for a pension, especially one under the operation of a private bill, the burden is upon him to show clearly the circumstances which entitle him to receive it. Now, inasmuch as the Pension Office has once rejected this claim, and we must presume upon satisfactory evidence, for it is not disclosed in the report that it was not, because the report itself states that an examination subsequently had about this matter was unsatisfactory, therefore there are grave doubts as to whether this is a proper case for us to pass upon here in this special and exceptional way. I think it is not, and call for a vote.

The question was put; and the bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

OLIVER P. MARTIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4206) granting a pension to Oliver P. Martin.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Oliver P. Martin, late a private in Company I, Seventeenth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, subject to the provisions and limitations of the existing pension laws.

The report (by Mr. YODER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4206) granting a pension to Oliver P. Martin, beg leave to submit the following report:

Oliver P. Martin enlisted as a private in Company I, Seventeenth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, on the 1st day of February, 1864, and was mustered for discharge at Louisville, Ky., on the 16th day of July, 1865, at Camp Chase, Ohio. His regiment came to Camp Chase, Ohio, where he received his discharge papers, on the evening of July 20, 1865.

On the morning of the 21st of July, the next morning, he with others was ordered to get on a train of cars on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, to go to Zanesville, Ohio, and from there to his home; that he got upon the aforesaid train, and when about 16 miles east of Columbus, Ohio, a truck-wheel of the engine broke, causing an accident to the train, and that in the smash-up he was caught between two cars and his right leg was broken about 6 inches below the knee, disabling him from manual labor, and his present physical condition is such that he can do only the lightest kind of labor, suffering much pain in both his right leg and right ankle.

He filed his application in the Pension Office April 22, 1873, and it was rejected by the Department for the reason "that the injury was not received strictly while in the service in the line of duty." There is no doubt, from the evidence submitted and from all the papers now on file, that claimant suffered such injury and is now partially unable to support himself, and that this occurred the next morning after he had received his discharge, but before the Government had returned him to his home or place at which he had enlisted.

This case is similar to that of Henry Canode, favorably reported in the Forty-ninth Congress, first session, report No. 3267, which became a law. In view of the precedents thus established, and in view of the premises, the committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. PERKINS having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. KILGORE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar had had under consideration sundry pension bills and had directed him to report the same to the House with various recommendations.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the Chair will recognize alternately on either side gentlemen present to-night that they may call up for consideration by unanimous consent such bills as are in order. The Chair would suggest that if there be no objection the bills can be read and engrossed for a third reading, but not put upon their final passage, with the understanding that the reports will be printed in the RECORD in the morning, and the bills brought up at some Friday evening session as unfinished business and put upon their final passage. If there is no objection the Chair will recognize that order.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

NOYES BARBER.

Mr. MILES. I call up for consideration the bill (S. 388) to remove the charge of desertion now standing against the record of Noyes Barber on the rolls of the Navy Department.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove from the rolls and records of the Navy Department the charge of desertion now standing on the said rolls and records against Noyes Barber, late a paymaster's clerk in the Pacific squadron; and when so restored to issue to him an honorable discharge as of date April 27, 1865, and that the said Noyes Barber be restored to all rights suspended or lost by said record.

The report (by Mr. DOLLIVER) is as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the act (S. 388) to remove the charge of desertion now standing against the record of Noyes Barber, on the rolls of the Navy Department, beg leave to report:

The said act is accompanied by Senate Report No. 322. Concurring in the reasons set forth therein, your committee adopt the same as their report, and recommend the passage of the bill.

[Senate Report No. 322, Fifty-first Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 388) to remove the charge of desertion now standing against the record of Noyes Barber, on the rolls of the Navy Department, beg leave to report as follows:

Noyes Barber, the applicant for relief, enlisted on the 1st day of December, A. D. 1861, in Company C, Twelfth New York Volunteers, for the period of three years. At the time of such enlistment Barber was not yet seventeen years of age.

He was captured at Gaines's Mills, Va., during the seven days' battle before Richmond, and was imprisoned in Libby Prison and at Belle Isle. Upon being exchanged, he was on the 24th of January A. D. 1862, discharged for disability.

August 5, 1863, he re-enlisted as a member of Company I, First Connecticut Cavalry, serving until April 26, 1864, when he was transferred to the Navy by enlistment, to serve the unexpired term of the original enlistment, the same being one year two months and nine days.

Entering the Navy Barber served on the U. S. S. Princeton and Cyane, leaving the latter ship, without permission, April 27, 1865, two months and eight days prior to the expiration of the period of his enlistment.

From all the evidence before the committee it appears that Barber was a good soldier and seaman, and while in the naval service he was assigned to duties not usually performed by the ordinary seaman.

The reasons assigned by Barber for his desertion were that he had just heard of the death of his father, who was also in the Navy, and was killed at the storming of Fort Fisher; also, that his mother was ill and had the care of two small children; that under these conditions he asked, and was refused leave of absence in order that he might go home to visit his mother; therefore he left his ship.

Attention is directed to the fact that had Barber remained with his ship until May 1, 1865, or three days longer, the act of August 14, 1868, "to relieve certain appointed or enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps from the charge of desertion," would have been applicable to his case, and the relief now asked by special legislative enactment would have been granted upon application to the proper Department.

In view of the peculiar circumstances attending this case the passage of the bill is recommended.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

J. G. FETHERSTONE.

Mr. PEEL. I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 5712) granting a pension to J. G. Fetherstone.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jesse G. Fetherstone, late a private in Fletcher's First Tennessee Volunteers, and pay him a pension from and after the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. BROWNE, of Virginia) is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5712) granting a pension to Jesse G. Fetherstone, have considered the same and report:

The claimant was a private in Captain Fletcher's company of the First Tennessee Mounted Volunteers, and served from June 18, 1866, to January 17, 1867, in the Creek and Seminole Indian war.

The claimant filed an application for pension June 9, 1883, alleging that while in the service and line of duty he received an injury of the right arm from a kick of a horse. This claim was rejected by the Pension Bureau June 30, 1885, upon the ground that there is no record of the alleged injury and soldier's inability to prove it as the result of the service.

William E. Evans testifies he was a comrade of the claimant and saw him soon after receiving the alleged injury, and understood at the time that it was incurred as stated by the applicant.

Other evidence tending to show that the applicant has been a sufferer from an injury of the shoulder continuously since his said service was filed in the Pension Bureau.

It is shown that the claimant is now about seventy-five years old, very poor, and too feeble to earn anything to aid in his support.

Your committee are of the opinion that the claim is a meritorious one, and the bill is therefore reported back with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

JAMES H. VOSBURGH.

Mr. RIFE. I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 10710) granting an increase of pension to James H. Vosburgh.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of James H. Vosburgh, late private Company H, Forty-ninth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, to $30 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10710) granting an increase of pension to James H. Vosburgh, submit the following report:

James H. Vosburgh served as private in Company H, Forty-ninth Ohio Volunteers, from August 15, 1861, to September 15, 1864, when he was discharged on account of a gunshot wound of right heel received in action at Dallas, Ga., May 27, 1864. He was pensioned on account of said wound and resulting ascending paralysis at $4 per month from discharge; at $8 from August 16, 1879; at $12 from April 15, 1881; at $24 from February 6, 1884; and since May 27, 1885, has been in receipt of $30 per month because of inability to perform any manual labor. He applied for further increase in September, 1887, but his claim therefor has been rejected because he does not require that constant aid and attendance of another person contemplated by law to give title to the highest rate of pension provided for total helplessness.

The action of the Pension Office in rejecting the claim was proper under existing laws. It appears, however, that by reason of the severe nervous affection due to the gunshot wound of the heel, pensioner's whole system has become affected. The functions of the stomach and heart are seriously impaired. The lower extremities are most of the time useless for the purposes of locomotion, the irritation of the spinal column and affection of the head causes much suffering, while the left shoulder and arm are much smaller than its fellow and too weak for any practical use.

In consequence of these conditions he can not dress or undress himself and otherwise needs the almost constant aid and attendance of another person. Dr. W. F. Flack, the pensioner's family physician, says that Vosburgh is confined to his bed fully one-third of his time; that there is no hope for improvement in his condition, and in fact he can live but a short time. He is very poor and himself and family almost entirely dependent upon others.

Your committee are of the opinion that the condition shown by medical and other evidence warrants the granting of an increase of pension, and therefore return the accompanying bill with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

PHILIP H. EMMERT.

Mr. GOODNIGHT. I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 1738) granting a pension to Philip H. Emmert.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Philip H. Emmert, late a private in Company D, Twenty-third Regiment of Kentucky Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. GOODNIGHT) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1738) granting a pension to Philip H. Emmert, of Tompkinsville, Ky., submit the following report:

Applicant enlisted September, 1861; was honorably discharged from Company D, Twenty-third Kentucky Volunteers, December, 1865. Hospital records show treatment in June, 1865, without showing diagnosis, and also October and November for intermittent fever, and August, 1865, treated for bite of spider, or tarantula, in Texas, while in hospital; comrades prove also that he received shell wound in left knee at Kenesaw Mountain, June, 1864; this fact is proved beyond question, and that it disables him till this day.

It is also proven by many reputable men that Emmert was a sound man when he enlisted, and that since his discharge and return he has been unable for manual labor continually, from one-half to three-fourths of normal capacity; that such disability arises from chronic diarrhea, shell wound, and from complaint of left breast, shoulder, and arm, from bite of tarantula, which members are proven to have withered, by Dr. Sims, a most excellent doctor and gentleman, as well as by lay evidence. A number of his comrades testify that these afflictions were incurred in line of duty, and this satisfactorily appears from the testimony of Surg. A. M. Morrison and other physicians, Surgeon Morrison also testifying that the applicant was unable for any sort of service when discharged.

It seems clear to your committee that the soldier was sound when he entered the service; that he has sustained a wound in the leg which is disabling; incurred chronic diarrhea, which also disables, and which has been continuous since discharge, and that the injury from spider bite is severe and constitutional, as appears also from examining-board reports.

Your committee therefore report the bill back with favorable recommendation and ask its passage.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

MARY A. GREEN.

On motion of Mr. CASWELL, by unanimous consent, the House proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 1333) granting a pension to Mary A. Green.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Mary A. Green, widow of William A. Green, late colonel of the Twenty-ninth Wisconsin Infantry, at the rate of $30 per month.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1333) granting a pension to Mary A. Green, submit the following report:

William A. Green, the soldier and husband of the beneficiary, Mary A. Green, was colonel of the Twenty-ninth Regiment of Wisconsin Volunteers in the late war. He was a gallant soldier and made an honorable record. He lost his health in the late war, and at the time of his death, July 13, 1880, was drawing a pension of $30 per month. He died with the disease for which he was pensioned, leaving Mary A. Green, the beneficiary, and four children under the age of sixteen years.

His widow and children succeeded to the pension in consequence of the death of the husband and father. On the 10th day of August, 1881, the widow was married to one J. J. Bennett and ceased to draw a pension from that time. The youngest child became sixteen years of age on the 8th day of July, 1886, and no pension has been drawn on account of the death of Colonel Green since that date.

The husband, J. J. Bennett, never contributed any support to the beneficiary. They lived together for a few years, during which time he ill-treated and wholly neglected his wife until they finally separated, and on the 11th day of June, 1889, the court granted a decree of divorce separating the parties on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment and an utter failure to provide her support.

It appears from the records in court and from affidavits that the treatment of Mrs. Green practiced upon her by her husband was such as to make it impossible for her to live with him, while he had used and wasted all her means until she was obliged to support herself and children by teaching school, and is now working out by the week to maintain herself. She has always been a woman of excellent character and entirely worthy. In the judgment of divorce her name was changed back to her former name of Green, which she now bears.

The committee report the bill back to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

ELIZABETH GUSHWA.

On motion of Mr. McCLELLAN, by unanimous consent, the House proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 9138) granting a pension to Elizabeth Gushwa.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth Gushwa, mother of William Gushwa, late a private of Company F, Forty-eighth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. MARTIN, of Indiana) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9138) granting a pension to Elizabeth Gushwa, have had the same under consideration and beg to submit the following report:

The facts in the case are as follows:

The claimant is the mother of William Gushwa, a private of Company F, Forty-eighth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, who died a short time after his discharge, of disability contracted in the service; that she was dependent upon him for her support; that she is the mother of four other sons who died while in the service in the war of the rebellion; that she has no means, and for the last twenty years has been wholly unable to earn her own living by her own labor, and that during most of that time she has been an inmate of the poor-house of La Grange County, Indiana.

She never filed a claim for pension for the reason that she had no means to get the evidence, which is scattered and far away, and she had no friends to assist her. She is now eighty-four years old, and being cared for by those who are under no legal obligations to do so, and this effort to get her a pension is made by those who are under no legal or equitable obligation to support her, but simply for the reason that they know that she has a good case, and could prove up as good a case as was ever presented to the Department if it was not for her extreme age and poverty. From these facts, clearly shown by the evidence, your committee believe she is entitled to a pension, and therefore respectfully recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

O. E. HUKILL.

On motion of Mr. FLICK, by unanimous consent, the House proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 10202) granting a pension to O. E. Hukill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of O. E. Hukill, late of Company B, Eighteenth Iowa Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. FLICK) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10202) granting a pension to O. E. Hukill, submit the following report:

O. E. Hukill served as private in Company B, Eighteenth Regiment Iowa Volunteers, from July 26, 1862, to July 20, 1865, when honorably mustered out. He applied for pension October 23, 1882, alleging that he contracted disease of eyes in the winter of 1865, while stationed at Fort Smith, Ark., from which he was seriously disabled, until in June, 1881, when the left eye was injured by the kick of a colt, necessitating its removal two months afterward, and that from sympathetic action the right eye became totally blind a few months later. The Pension Office admitted the claim for disease of eyes and allowed a pension of $4 per month, but refuses to increase that rate.

Dr. H. R. Layton testified before the special examiner that he was called to see the claimant about two months after the receipt of the injury to left eye, which was inflamed as was also the right eye. He amputated the left eye in the hope of relieving the right eye, but with no effect. About two weeks later the remainder of the left eye was extirpated, with no benefit whatever, as the inflammation was so great that it had caused destruction of the sight before the operation. In the opinion of the affiant the pre-existing disease of the eyes had a tendency to cause the inflammation produced by the injury to be more extensive and to become chronic, and had it not been for the diseased condition of the eyes before the injury the sight of the right eye could have been saved.

Dr. J. P. Maxwell, who was associated in the case, is of like opinion, as is Dr. H. C. Bone, who treated claimant for some years prior to the injury in 1881 and immediately thereafter. Hukill has no income from any source, and is now supported by charity.

Accepting these medical opinions, your committee must attribute this soldier's present deplorable condition as at least indirectly chargeable to his military service, and therefore report favorably on the accompanying bill, and ask that it do pass, amended, however, by striking out all after the word "pension," in line 6, and inserting therein instead the words "at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that now received by him."

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker, I do not exactly understand the effect of the amendment recommended by the committee, unless it means that they took the matter in their own hands and attempted to give the man more than the amount which he would have received under the bill as originally introduced.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The effect is to put him upon the pension-roll at the rate of $40 a month.

Mr. KILGORE. What was the provision of the original bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It proposed to pension him subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

Mr. KILGORE. Why should the committee undertake to give more than the man himself, through his Representative, asked by the original bill?

Mr. FLICK. This man is totally blind.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the general law, being totally blind, he would get $72 a month.

Mr. KILGORE. He would if the blindness was incurred in the service, but not otherwise. This amendment, then, is to give him $40 instead of $72, as I understand it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the effect of the amendment. The amendment was concurred in.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

JAMES BLYTHE.

On motion of Mr. QUINN, by unanimous consent, the House proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6179) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of James Blythe.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of James Blythe, formerly a private in Company P, Eighty-third New York Volunteers, and to restore to him all the rights, privileges, allowances, and emoluments he would have been entitled to if said charge had never been entered against his name.

The report (by Mr. CAREY) is as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6179) to remove charge of desertion from the record of James Blythe, having considered the same, respectfully report that James Blythe deserted February 23, 1863, while absent on furlough, and while suffering from a gunshot wound received at the battle of Fredericksburg, Va. He subsequently enlisted in another organization and served out his time and received an honorable discharge.

Your committee believe that such desertion was not wilful, or to avoid military service, but solely on account of said wound, which unfitted him, for the time being, for performing military duty, and when the charge of desertion was once entered up against him he did not dare to return to his original command, and so enlisted in another regiment. Your committee recommend that the bill be amended by striking out all after the word "to," in line 6 in said bill, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Grant him an honorable discharge under date of February 23, 1863; provided no pay or allowances shall become due or payable by virtue of this act subsequent to the date of such discharge."

Your committee have attached hereto and made a part of this report the military record of said soldier as furnished by the Adjutant-General, and recommend that the bill as amended do pass.

Case of James Blythe, late private, Company I, Eighty-third New York Volunteers, and Company I, One hundred and thirty-fourth Illinois Volunteers.

RECORD AND PENSION DIVISION, April 23, 1890.

James Blythe, private Company I, Eighty-third New York Volunteers, was enrolled November 14, 1861, to serve three years, and was present with his company until and including December 13, 1864, on which date he was wounded at the battle of Fredericksburg, Va., and was sent to hospital.

He was admitted to Lincoln General Hospital, Washington, D. C., December 23, 1862, with gunshot wound, left thigh; was furloughed therefrom on January 23, 1863, for thirty days, and did not thereafter return to the hospital or to his command, although his term of enlistment did not expire until November 14, 1864, and thereby became a deserter on the 23rd day of February, 1863. (The company muster-roll for March and April, 1863, and the regimental return for April, 1863, report the date of desertion as March 9 and April 1, 1863, respectively.)

On the 16th of May, 1864, while thus absent in desertion, he enlisted in Company I, One hundred and thirty-fourth Illinois Volunteers, for one hundred days, in violation of the 23d, now 50th, Article of War, and served faithfully therein until mustered out with the company on October 23, 1864.

The claimant swears that at the expiration of the furlough received at Lincoln General Hospital, Washington, D. C., he was unable, on account of the gunshot wound received at the battle of Fredericksburg, Va., to return to hospital; that he was treated for several months for said wound by Dr. Clow, his family physician, now dead, who informed him that he would never again be fit for military service; that he was so disabled for eight months after his return to his home that he was utterly unable to perform any manual labor; that he had no intention of deserting, but supposed, on account of his wound, that he would receive an honorable discharge.

In another affidavit, executed November 16, 1867, the claimant repeats his former testimony, recounts his services while with his command, and declares that he was never absent or sick for a single day up to the day on which he was wounded; that after treatment by Dr. Clow for five or six months, the latter gave him a letter to the effect that he was not fit for duty; that, having no home, he went to Chicago and found at that place men enlisting to meet General Hood, who, it was reported, was on his way up from Tennessee and Kentucky; that he enlisted in Company I, One hundred and thirty-fourth Illinois Volunteers, for ninety days, and served therein three months over his time on account of the rumored advance of General Hood; that after his muster-out, for a year, his health was poor, the result of the bad condition of his blood occasioned by his wound; that he would not have passed an examination for enlistment had he been closely inspected, as a corner of his wound had not, at that time, healed up.

James Dugan and James A. Scott swear jointly that they distinctly remember the claimant's return to his home in February, 1863; that he was suffering from a gunshot wound of left thigh, which rendered him unable to perform labor of any description for seven or eight months; that for two months he was compelled to use crutches, and during the remainder of the time he used a stout cane by which to support himself in his walks; that they visited him frequently, and occasionally met there Dr. Clow, who was treating him.

Charles Coe, under date of January 21, 1867, gives testimony corroborative of the statements of affiants Dugan and Scott.

John P. Nelson, son-in-law of Dr. Clow, before mentioned, states that the account-book and paper belonging to the late Dr. Clow have been destroyed, and that he is unable to give the desired information concerning the claimant's treatment.

On January 27, 1890, in a letter to the Hon. JOHN QUINN, M. C., the soldier's record was quoted, and Mr. QUINN was informed that the case had heretofore been carefully considered by the Department, and had been denied on September 16, 1886, and on May 12, 1887, on the ground that the testimony submitted did not establish that the soldier was prevented by his wound from completing his term of enlistment; that the justice of these decisions was made manifest when, on November 16, 1867, the claimant admitted that on May 16, 1864, he enlisted at Chicago, Ill., in Company I, One hundred and thirty-fourth Illinois Volunteers, and served therein until mustered out with his company on October 23, 1864, which service was rendered prior to the expiration of his term of enlistment in the Eighty-third New York Volunteers, and that as the former decisions of the Department in this case were in accordance with the law and the facts, they must be adhered to.

Respectfully submitted,

F. C. AINSWORTH,
Captain and Assistant Surgeon, United States Army.

THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

MR. KILGORE. I do not quite understand this bill. Who has charge of it?

THE SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. QUINN]. The bill comes from the Committee on Military Affairs.

MR. KILGORE. I do not understand that it is a bill to remove the charge of desertion.

THE SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the purpose of the bill, and to give the man an honorable discharge.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

MRS. MARY J. SANDERS.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Illinois, the House, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6148) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary J. Sanders.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Mary J. Sanders, the widow of Thomas A. Sanders, who was a scout in the service of the United States Army during the war of the rebellion.

The report (by Mr. LANE) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6148) granting a pension to Mary J. Sanders, submit the following report: That said committee have considered this case and find that the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the Forty-seventh Congress made a favorable report in this case to that Congress, which report this committee adopt as their report, which report is in the words and figures following:

"From the papers before the committee it appears that Mary J. Sanders is the widow of Thomas A. Sanders, who was employed as a scout in the military service of the United States during the late war and was captured and killed by the Confederates in McNairy County, State of Tennessee, about July 23, 1864. Her claim has been rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that her husband was not an enlisted man, neither was he of the class of persons provided for by the third paragraph of section 4693 of the Revised Statutes.

"Among the papers in support of her claim is the affidavit of G. M. Dodge, late brigadier-general, United States Army, and commanding the post of Corinth, Miss. The affiant states that the name of T. A. Sanders is familiar to him, and that it is his impression that said Sanders was with the affiant as a scout and he was killed or died while he was in said service. The fact that affiant had a large number of men engaged in similar service makes it impossible for him to make a definite statement at this late day.

"Fielding Hurst, late colonel of the Sixth Regiment of West Tennessee Cavalry, testifies that he well knew Thomas A. Sanders, late of McNairy County, Tennessee, who entered the United States service as a scout the first night after the first transports of United States troops landed at Crump's Landing, Tenn.; had possession of Sanders's appointment until after the Shiloh fight and during the siege of Corinth. Some time subsequently affiant was asked by General Dodge whether said Sanders was a true and reliable Unionist, to which affiant responded affirmatively. General Dodge then informed the affiant that Sanders was employed by him as a scout, and that he (Sanders) on several occasions had ventured too far for his own good.

"When first employed Sanders acted under the direction of General Lew. Wallace. Affiant was near Memphis about the time Sanders was killed, and knows nothing personally as to the circumstances under which he came to his death. The fact that said Sanders was employed as a scout is also shown by the affidavits of Calvin Shell and J. B. Mills, of McNairy County, Tennessee.

"Angelina Small and Mary Sanders testify that said Thomas A. Sanders was taken prisoner by a captain of General Forrest's command, while at his father's house, July 23, 1864, and that about four days thereafter he was killed by said forces.

"William J. Russell testifies that he was a private in Captain Russell's company of Confederate troops, and while on a scout near Tusculum, Tenn., about July, 1863, said Thomas A. Sanders was taken prisoner and charged with being a Union spy. The morning after the capture Sanders was sent under guard to their headquarters, after which affiant saw no more of said Sanders; that Sanders was employed as a scout with the Union Army is known to affiant from information received direct from him (Sanders) some twelve months previous to his capture.

"W. F. Moore, also of McNairy County, Tennessee, testifies that he was acquainted with Sanders in his lifetime, and saw him after he was shot and assisted in his burial. He was shot within one-half mile of affiant's residence, and he heard the report of the guns when he was killed. Affiant knew nothing of his connection with the Army, except by rumor, and that he was acting as a Federal spy, and his killing was because of that service.

"The claimant's marriage to Thomas A. Sanders on the 30th of October, 1846, is shown by the certificate of the proper court. She has six children, all of whom, however, are now over the age of sixteen years.

"The committee are fully satisfied by the evidence in the case that Thomas A. Sanders was employed and rendered efficient service in the Union Army as a scout, and that he came to his death at the hands of the Confederates by reason of such service. They therefore report favorably and recommend the passage of the bill (H. R. 1899) granting a pension to Mary J. Sanders."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

MARGARET DURAND.

On motion of Mr. SHIVELY, the House, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 10465) granting a pension to Margaret Durand.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Margaret Durand, as attendant nurse at Mound City Hospital, near Cairo, Ill., during the war of the rebellion, at the rate of $12 per month.

The report (by Mr. MARTIN, of Indiana) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10465) granting a pension to Margaret Durand, have had the same under consideration and adopt the following favorable report made by the Committee on Invalid Pensions on this bill in the Fiftieth Congress:

"The claimant herein was a nurse and matron of the general hospital, Mound City, Ill., in 1861-'62, as appears by a certificate of the Surgeon-General and by the affidavits of Sister Athanasius and Sister M. Celesta, now residing at St. Mary's Academy, Notre Dame, South Bend, Ind. They testify, in a joint affidavit, in substance as follows:

"We were attendant nurses at Mound City Hospital, near Cairo, in the State of Illinois, in the years 1861 and 1862; that Mrs. Margaret Durand, of South Bend, Ind., came as a nurse to said hospital in December, 1861, and attended as regular nurse of the soldiers sick and disabled in said hospital until the spring of 1862; that her health failed her at that time and she was sent home with the hope that she might recover and return, but that her health was not re-established and she was unable to return to the hospital.

"We further certify that the said Margaret Durand is now in advanced age and deserving of a pension from the Government, and that we have no interest in her claim.

"As stated, the claimant is in advanced age, and by her services among the sick and wounded in the hospital where she served she impaired her health to such an extent that she has never fully recovered. She is without adequate means of support and unable, by reason of her age and impaired health, to earn sufficient means of support, and it seems to the committee that the small amount asked for in the bill ought to be granted.

"We therefore submit a favorable report and recommend the passage of the bill."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

DELILA ROE.

On motion of Mr. FINLEY, by unanimous consent, the House proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 3503) for the relief of Delila Roe.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Delila Roe, widow of George O. Roe, on the pension-roll and pay her a pension during her natural life, as is now by law allowed and paid the widows of deceased soldiers.

The report (by Mr. GOODNIGHT) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3563) for the relief of Della Roe, respectfully report that they find that George C. Roe, husband of Della Roe, raised a company of home guards and was elected captain thereof in 1861, and that said company did good service in holding the Confederates in check, and did such service as to exasperate the Confederates, so that when they captured Roe they took him with two others and shot them in cold blood. His widow, Della Roe, is seventy-five years of age and in indigent circumstances.

The affidavits of J. L. McCarty, R. C. Lawson, Julian Reed, Edward Perkins, neighbors of said Roe, all substantiate the statement that said Roe raised the company, was captain thereof, and did valiant service for the Union, and that he was captured and never returned. The affidavit of said Edward Perkins proves the death of said Roe and that he was shot while a prisoner. The petition setting forth facts as stated is signed by seventy reputable citizens in the county in which said Roe lived prior to his death, and your committee believe that the case is a meritorious one and report back the bill and recommend its passage, amended by striking out the sixth and seventh lines of the bill and adding thereto these words: "twelve dollars per month."

The amendment recommended by the committee was concurred in.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

WILLIAM H. KEYS.

On motion of Mr. FLOWER, by unanimous consent, the House proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4781) for the relief of William H. Keys.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, instructed and directed to remove and expunge from the records the charge of desertion now borne upon said rolls against William H. Keys, late private in Company G, Sixty-ninth Regiment New York Infantry Volunteers, and to issue to him an honorable discharge from the military service of the United States.

The report (by Mr. CAREY) is as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4781) for the relief of William H. Keys, having considered the same, respectfully report:

That William H. Keys enlisted February 8, 1864, as a recruit at the age of fifteen years, and was assigned to Company G of the Sixty-ninth New York Volunteer Infantry. Owing to his extreme youth he was unable to endure the fatigue of the march, and was sent to hospital at New York in August, 1864. From thence he was furloughed to go to his home in New York City. He had enlisted without his father's knowledge or consent, and when the boy got home his father compelled him to go aboard a vessel and sent him to Europe, where he remained until the war had closed. Your committee submit as part of their report the petition of said Keys and the report of the Adjutant-General.

Your committee would recommend that the bill be amended by adding, after line 8 in such bill, the following:

"To date September 15, 1864: Provided, That the relief hereby granted shall not entitle such soldier to any pay or emoluments for any time while not in the actual performance of military duty."

And your committee recommend, in view of the extreme youth of such soldier and his natural subjection to parental authority, he should have the relief prayed for, and we recommend that the bill do pass.

Case of William Keys, late private Company G, Sixty-ninth New York Volunteers.

RECORD AND PENSION DIVISION, March 20, 1890.

William Keys, private Company G, Sixty-ninth New York Volunteers, was enrolled on February 8, 1864, to serve three years. The enlistment paper states his age as eighteen years. On April 30, 1864, he was present with his company. The muster-roll of June 30, 1864, reports him "deserted May 5 from the battle of Wilderness." His name is not borne on the rolls of August 31 and October 31, 1864. The rolls from November 1, 1864, to April 30, 1865, and the muster-out roll, dated at Alexandria, Va., June 30, 1865, report him "absent sick."

The return for May, 1864, shows him "missing in action May 10, 1864, at Po River."

The medical records show that he was admitted to the first division of depot field hospital, Second Army Corps, at City Point, Va., July 5, 1864, as convalescent, and transferred to general hospital, Blackwell's Island, New York Harbor, where he was admitted on August 1, 1864, with chronic diarrhea, and he is reported as having deserted there on September 15, 1864.

In an affidavit of August 27, 1869, this man made the following statement:

"When he enlisted he was fifteen years and fifteen days old. He wanted to join the First New York (Lincoln) Cavalry, but he was assigned to the Sixty-ninth New York Volunteers, which regiment he joined at Brandy Station, Va. In the first part of May, 1864, he was taken sick and went to one of the field hospitals, where he helped to take care of the wounded. From there he was sent to City Point, Va., and thence to Blackwell's Island, being sick with fever. About September 1, 1864, he went to New York City on a pass to see his folks, when his father would not allow him to return to the hospital, and compelled him, against his will, to go on a steamer to Europe."

Alexander Price, in his affidavit of August 24, 1869, testified that he is familiar with the handwriting of applicant's father; he has examined the family Bible of the Keys family, and has found in the record of births that this applicant was born on January 24, 1849, said entry being in the handwriting of applicant's father.

Robert Cunningham and Ira G. Lane, in affidavits of August 24, 1869, testify similarly to Alexander Price.

Isaac Lunney, in affidavit of August 23, 1869, testified that about September 1, 1864, he lived with Christopher Keys, the applicant's father; about that time this soldier came home and remained there all night; about 10 o'clock on the next day he went with the soldier to the corner of Spring and Broadway to meet the father, who told the soldier then and there that he was going to send him to Europe. The soldier objected and refused to go, and only after earnest pleading and coaxing on his father's part did he go on board, the father remaining with him till the steamer started.

After this the father told applicant that he had tried every means to get the boy out of the Army, but failed; that he had only two sons, one of them only seventeen years of age, being then a member of the First Lincoln Cavalry Volunteers, and that it was not right for the Government to have both of his minor sons.

No other testimony has been submitted. His name is not borne as William H. Keys.

Existing law affords no relief in this case, and the application was therefore rejected on September 7, 1869.

Respectfully submitted.

F. C. AINSWORTH,

Captain and Assistant Surgeon, United States Army.

THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your petitioner, William H. Keyes, a citizen of the United States, residing at No. 308 East Sixty-ninth street, in the city of New York, State of New York, respectfully represents that on the 8th day of February, 1864, in the said city of New York, while a minor, being only fifteen years and fifteen days old (an infant in the eye of the law), he ran away from school and, without his parents' consent or knowledge, enlisted for service in the First Regiment (Lincoln) New York Cavalry Volunteers, and certainly expected to be sent to said regiment, in which he had a number of friends and acquaintances; but, contrary to his expectations and in direct violation of the terms of enlistment, he was assigned to the Sixty-ninth Regiment New York Infantry and sent to the front, though at the time, because of his tender years and undeveloped physical condition, he was not strong enough to hold a regulation musket at a ready, or in the position to fire, as specified in military "infantry tactics."

Your petitioner further declares that, owing to his immature physical condition and the hardships incident to infantry service, he was taken sick some time in May, 1864, and sent to a field hospital, and after a time was sent to City Point and from thence to Blackwell's Island (N. Y.) hospital. While under treatment in said hospital, to wit, about September 15, 1864, he obtained a pass to visit his parents at No. 308 East Fourteenth street, New York City; that he made such visit, and at the instance of his parents remained all night; that he made such visit, his father told him to meet him (his father) at 11 o'clock at the corner of Spring street and Broadway. He obeyed his command and met him, when he then and there informed him that he intended to take him out of the Army and send him to Europe.

To this he demurred and strenuously objected, and finally absolutely refused to go, but after earnest pleading and coaxing on the part of his father, supplemented by a positive and peremptory parental command, he yielded, and went with his father on board the steamer, where he remained until she started, to watch him and prevent him from returning to the Army. It will be seen by the affidavits herewith presented and on file in the War Department that it was through no voluntary act of his, nor from any intention to desert, that he left his command.

In the first place, the officer who enlisted him should have been court-martialed for such palpable violation of his duty, and the surgeon who examined and passed him as an acceptable recruit, if an expert in anatomy, as he should have been, ought at once to have seen his immature physical condition and have rejected him. It is also in evidence that after his enlistment and during his sickness in hospital his father fully explained to the military authorities all the facts in relation to his extreme youth, and exhausted every available means to obtain his discharge in the usual way, but without success, and having given to the service his only brother (who he may state was also a minor, being but seventeen years old), determined to effect his release through and by such means as were available, and by force, moral as well as parental, compelled him to remain from his command until after his pass had expired and he was marked on the rolls as a deserter, and then sent him beyond the reach of our military authorities until his term of service expired.

Your petitioner does not ask for any pay or bounty that may be due him for the period during which it is admitted that he performed faithfully such service as he could, owing to his undeveloped physical condition, but he earnestly requests that in view of all the facts alleged and proven he be granted an honorable discharge from the military service, and that the Secretary of War be directed and commanded by your honorable bodies to issue such honorable discharge and cause to be expunged from his record any charge of desertion found thereon as against your petitioner.

This he asks as a matter of justice and in order that his otherwise honorable character may not have resting upon it the stigma of being borne on the public records of his country as a deserter, and as in duty bound your petitioner will ever pray.

WILLIAM H. KEYES.

The amendment recommended by the committee in the report was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. FLOWER. I ask unanimous consent that that bill be put upon its passage.

There was no objection; and the bill was accordingly passed.

NANCY A. THORNTON.

On motion of Mr. BAKER, the House, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1732) granting a pension to Nancy A. Thornton.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Nancy A. Thornton, widow of John W. Thornton, deceased.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1732) granting a pension to Nancy A. Thornton, submit the following report:

The beneficiary under this bill is the widow of John W. Thornton, who was terribly wounded during the Quantrell raid on the city of Lawrence, Kans. Seven bullets took effect, rendering him a helpless cripple. In the Forty-ninth Congress he was granted a pension by a special act. As his death was the result of his fearful wounds there seems no reason why the widow should not be put on the pension-roll, and your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BAKER. I ask unanimous consent that that bill pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hopes the gentleman from New York [Mr. FLOWER] has not established a bad precedent.

Mr. HEARD. I shall have to object, Mr. Speaker. It is only fair that we should all have an equal chance.

OZEO HARRINGTON.

On motion of Mr. KILGORE, the House, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 2518) granting a pension to Ozeo Harrington.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Ozeo Harrington, late a private in Company H, First Regiment Iowa Cavalry Volunteers, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2516) granting a pension to Osro Harrington, submit the following report:

The claimant, Osro Harrington, enlisted in Company H, First Iowa Cavalry, on the 16th day of September, 1861, to serve for three years or during the war; re-enlisted as a veteran January 4, 1864; was honorably discharged at the muster-out of his company February 15, 1866, at Austin, Tex., having faithfully served for four years, four months, and twenty-nine days. The claimant made application for pension in the year 1890, alleging that he contracted pleurisy from hard riding about November, 1864, but afterwards amended the date to July, 1864. Claimant alleges that he was treated for his disability, as stated, in regimental hospital, but the Surgeon-General's Office shows no record of treatment.

Maj. W. S. Wisenand, who was captain of the soldier's company, makes affidavit that on or about the 15th day of July, 1864, while in line of duty, in the State of Missouri, running about bushwhackers, the claimant incurred pleurisy; that from the date of this injury the claimant was very much afflicted during the remainder of his service; that he was with soldier since his enlistment in 1861; that he was in good health immediately preceding the time referred to above. The claimant alleges that the physician who first treated him after discharge is dead, and that he is unable to secure the testimony of regimental surgeon as to treatment in hospital.

Lieut. Samuel T. Craig, of claimant's company, testifies that on or about the 15th day of March, 1865, claimant went to him and said his side hurt him so that he could not wear belt or saber on account of pleurisy or swelling of side; that he, Lieutenant Craig, was at that time assistant adjutant-general on the staff of General E. D. Osband, and that on account of claimant's inability for service in the field he had him detailed as orderly at headquarters. Isaac N. Hosford testifies that he has been intimately acquainted with claimant since 1869; that he has frequently and often heard him make complaint of pleurisy pain in his side.

Dr. George W. Morrison, a practicing physician, testifies that he has known claimant since 1881; that he first examined and treated him for chronic splentitis in January, 1882; that he has frequently examined and treated him since.

Dr. J. T. Davis in 1885 testifies that he has treated claimant for chronic hypertrophy of the spleen a number of times during the past three years. Dr. Hyatt also testified to his having treated soldier in 1888, agreeing with the other physicians in diagnosis of disability.

This claim was rejected at the Pension Office in 1886; reasons stated: No record of disease and claimant unable to furnish required medical evidence.

Your committee are of the opinion that the evidence of claimant's captain, corroborated by his lieutenant, clearly establishes the incurrence of claimant's disability. Owing to the death of the physician who first treated claimant after discharge there is a break of a few years in the chain of medical testimony, which missing link is at least partially restored by the evidence of Mr. Hosford, and since 1881 we have a continuous chain of medical evidence which, to the minds of your committee, establishes beyond a doubt the justness of the claim; therefore your committee give it favorable report and recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

MRS. MARY HOGAN.

On motion of Mr. MOFFITT, the House, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 9163) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary Hogan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll the name of Mrs. Mary Hogan, widow of Thomas Hogan, late of Battery D, Third United States Artillery, and allow her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The report (by Mr. HILL) is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9163) granting a pension to Mary Hogan, have considered the same and report:

The claimant's late husband, Thomas Hogan, deceased, was a private in Battery D, Third United States Artillery, and served from August 4, 1860, to August 4, 1865, when honorably discharged by reason of expiration of term of service. The records show that the battery participated in the campaign and operations against hostile Seminole Indians in Florida from 1860 to 1862.

The testimony filed in support of the bill establishes the identity of the claimant as the widow of the soldier. Her residence is Chateaugay, Franklin County, New York. It is also shown that the claimant is an aged and worthy woman and that she has no means of support.

In view of the facts stated your committee report the bill back with a favorable recommendation.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

WILLIAM C. EBERT.

On motion of Mr. PETERS, by unanimous consent, the House proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 2550) granting a pension to William C. Ebert.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William C. Ebert, disabled while acting as a volunteer citizen soldier in the provost guard, and pay him a pension from the date of disability at the same rate as provided by existing law for a similar disability.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2550) granting a pension to William C. Ebert, submit the following report:

The claimant, William C. Ebert, alleges that at the commencement of the war of the rebellion he was a resident of Hannibal, Mo.; that he had been a resident of said place since the spring of 1857; that during the latter part of July, 1862, a military company was being formed for the purpose of protecting property and guarding a large amount of United States military stores in charge of Maj. E. Wilmot, quartermaster at that post; that he joined and became a member of said company; that on the 6th day of August, 1862, claimant was detailed by Maj. Thomas D. Price, provost-marshal at Hannibal, Mo., to guard a large amount of military stores which were in charge of Maj. E. Wilmot, quartermaster, a requisition having been made by the quartermaster upon the provost-marshal for a guard; that while in the performance of said duty, on the night of the 6th day of August, 1862, he received a gunshot wound in the elbow of his left arm, and that on the following day his arm was amputated a few inches above the elbow by Drs. Edward Duffield and Benedict T. Norton, and further that the said Dr. Duffield died some years since.

Dr. Benedict T. Norton testifies that he assisted in the amputation of left arm of claimant on or about the 7th day of August, 1862, made necessary by claimant having received a gunshot wound while acting in line of duty as a member of the provost-marshal guard. Thomas M. Price, who is now and has been since 1878 land commissioner of the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company, was paymaster of said company from 1853 to 1865, testifies that he was major of the Thirty-eighth Regiment of Enrolled Missouri Militia; that on or about the 3d day of August, 1862, he was duly appointed provost-marshal, with headquarters in the city of Hannibal, and entered at once upon the discharge of his duty; that to the best of his recollection at the time there were no regular troops there that could be called upon to do guard duty, and being called upon by Maj. E. Wilmot, post quartermaster, for guards, he organized a volunteer guard of citizens; he ordered the claimant, William C. Ebert, to act as a guard for military stores.

While in the line of his duty as such, on or about the 6th day of August, 1862, and during the night, the claimant was disabled by a gunshot wound in left arm; that in consequence thereof the arm was soon after amputated by Drs. Duffield and Benedict, of Hannibal, Mo.

T. K. Hayward, ex-mayor of Hannibal, Mo., testifies that he has been a resident of Hannibal, Mo., since 1858; that Thomas M. Price was provost-marshal at the time specified above; also that Major Wilmot was post quartermaster, and his testimony in relation to the incurrence of claimant's disability is substantially the same as that of the provost-marshal, Thomas E. Price. Alexander F. Denny makes affidavit that Thomas E. Price was provost-marshal at the time specified, and that he was his successor and relieved him in August, 1862.

It does not appear that claimant had been mustered into the United States service, therefore, under existing law, could not be granted a pension by the Pension Bureau; but it appears from the testimony that the claimant was performing the duty, under orders of the provost-marshal, of a regularly mustered soldier, and that while in line of duty lost his arm.

Your committee is informed that the claimant is a highly respected citizen of Hannibal, and did not intend to make application to the Government for pension until he met with business reverses which forced him to do so for the support of his family.

Your committee submit a favorable report and recommend that the bill do pass with the following amendment: Striking out all after the word "guard," in line 7.

The amendment recommended by the committee in the last paragraph of the report was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

THOMAS THOMPSON.

On motion of Mr. BOOTHMAN, by unanimous consent, the House proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 10246) granting a pension to Thomas Thompson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll the name of Thomas Thompson, dependent and crippled son of Cornelius Thompson, late a private in Company D, One hundred and ninety-second Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and to pay him a pension of $12 per month.

The report (by Mr. YODER) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10246) granting a pension to Thomas Thompson, submit the following report:

Thomas Thompson, the claimant, is the son of Cornelius Thompson, late a member of Company D, One hundred and ninety-second Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, who died from disease contracted while in the service. His widow, Mary Thompson, was pensioned on account of the death of her husband. She is now dead, and no one is drawing a pension on account of the soldier's death.

Thomas Thompson is forty years of age, weighs 75 pounds, is 4 feet and 5 inches in height, small bones, measures 31 inches around the waist. He is pigeon-breasted; has lateral curvature of the spine. He is suffering from general deformity. He is in poor circumstances, without any one legally bound to support him, and is the subject of charity.

Your committee are of the opinion that this is a meritorious case and recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

JAMES M. THOMPSON.

On motion of Mr. O'NEIL, of Massachusetts, the House, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 9030) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of James M. Thompson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby is, authorized and directed to cause the records of the War Department to be so amended as to remove the charge of desertion from the service record of James M. Thompson, late a private in Company F, Twelfth Regiment of Maine Volunteers, and to grant an honorable discharge to the said James M. Thompson as a private of said company, as of the date of April 8, 1863.

The report (by Mr. CAREY) is as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9030) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of James M. Thompson, having considered the same, respectfully report:

That James M. Thompson was enrolled February 1, 1863, as a member of Company F, Twelfth Maine Volunteers, to serve three years, and was subsequently transferred to Company D, of the same regiment. This soldier was with his company, or on detached duty as a clerk in the Savannah, Ga., post-office, until April 11, 1863. His company was mustered out of service seven days thereafter. The evidence shows that the soldier while on detached service contracted sore eyes, and after being relieved of duty as a clerk, fearing that he might lose his eyesight, went home. This soldier is not relieved by the general law. The committee recommend that the bill do pass.

Case of James M. Thompson, late a private in Company F, Twelfth Maine Volunteers. RECORDED AND PENSION DIVISION, May 2, 1890.

The official records show that James M. Thompson was enrolled at Augusta, Me., on February 1, 1863, as a member of Company F, Twelfth Maine Volunteers, to serve three years, and that he served faithfully therein until the muster for November and December, 1863, when he is reported as absent on detached duty as clerk in the post-office at Savannah, Ga.

On the muster-roll of Company D, of the same regiment (to which he had been transferred), for January and February, 1865, the soldier is reported present for duty.

On the company muster-out roll dated April 18, 1866, he is reported as having deserted April 10, 1866, at Savannah, Ga., while the company morning report gives the date of desertion (at the same place) as April 11, 1866.

From this desertion he did not return nor report his whereabouts or the cause of his absence to the proper military authorities.

The following is a synopsis of the testimony heretofore presented in the case in connection with the application for removal of the charge of desertion standing against the record of this soldier, to wit:

Under dates of July 1, October 20, and —, 1869, the soldier testified that while on duty in the post-office at Savannah, Ga., he contracted sore eyes, and that as the war was over, and fearing he would lose his eyesight if he remained any longer, he went home on or about April 10, 1866; that he had been relieved from duty in the post-office by reason of his disability (sore eyes) by the post surgeon "Bean or Dean," though he still remained and did duty there up to the time of his departure. The soldier further declared that he performed no duty with his company (D), as it was encamped at the further end of the city, and that he had no army or naval service prior to February, 1865.

(When this soldier first made application for relief he signed himself as James Martin and stated that he had enlisted in Company F, Twelfth Maine Volunteers, under the name James M. Thompson.)

William J. Fogerty, a comrade, testified under date of September 13, 1869, that the soldier was afflicted with sore eyes in the spring of 1865, while on duty in the post-office at Savannah, Ga.; that he became unfit for duty; and that he was relieved from further service therein by the post (army) surgeon by reason of said affliction, the same having been contracted in the line of duty.

James Powers, late a private in Company C, Twelfth Maine Volunteers, testified September 26, 1869, that he was doing duty with Thompson in the Savannah, Ga., post-office at the time he became afflicted with sore eyes contracted in the line of duty, and that he (Thompson) was relieved and ordered to hospital.

On September 30, 1869, the authorized attorney in the case was informed that "in view of the fact that this soldier was relieved from duty as clerk as early as January or February, 1866, and that he was present on duty with his company thereafter up to the date of his desertion, the testimony submitted is not deemed sufficient to warrant any favorable action in the case." The application was therefore denied.

The application was again denied January 14, 1890, on the ground that "as this soldier did not serve six months prior to May 1, 1865; as the charge of desertion was not erroneously made, and as the testimony does not establish that he was prevented by disability contracted in the line of duty from completing his term of enlistment," favorable action could not be taken.

Since then the status of the soldier has not been changed by the introduction of new testimony or by subsequent legislation.

Respectfully submitted,

F. C. AINSWORTH,
Captain and Assistant Surgeon, United States Army.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

CLARA FOWLER.

On motion of Mr. TURNER, of Kansas, the House, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 3070) granting a pension to Clara Fowler.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Clara Fowler, daughter of Francis A. Fowler, deceased, late a private of Company A, Seventh Wisconsin Volunteers, at the rate of $12 per month.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

Your committee have examined the evidence in the case of Clara Fowler, for whom a pension is provided in H. R. 3070, and find that she is the unmarried daughter of Francis A. Fowler, late a corporal of Company A, Seventh Regiment of Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, now deceased; that she was on the pension-roll until she became sixteen years of age; that she is totally blind and paralyzed and with impaired mind, and incapable of earning a living or caring for herself. Her mother remarried and is in dependent circumstances.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendment, striking out "twelve" in line 8 and inserting "eighteen."

The amendment recommended by the committee in the last paragraph of the report was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

MARY B. LE ROY.

Mr. TURNER, of New York. I ask the present consideration of the bill (S. 314) for the relief of Mary B. Le Roy.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act there be paid, out of the naval pension fund, to Mary B. Le Roy, widow of the late Rear-Admiral William E. Le Roy, United States Navy, the sum of $50 per month during her widowhood, that sum to be in lieu of her present pension.

The report (by Mr. TURNER, of New York) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 314) granting a pension to Mary B. Le Roy, submit the following report:

This bill was favorably reported by the Senate committee, whose report is as follows:

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 314) granting a pension to Mary B. Le Roy, widow of the late Rear-Admiral William E. Le Roy, United States Navy, have examined the same and report:

"That the claimant is the widow of William E. Le Roy, late rear-admiral in the Navy of the United States, who died in New York City on the 10th day of December, 1888. He was appointed to the Navy as midshipman January 11, 1832, and after passing through all the intermediate ranks was promoted to be rear-admiral on the 8th of April, 1874, and was retired on the 24th of March, 1880, after a period of active service of forty-eight years. During this time his service at sea was forty years, one of the longest on record.

"He served throughout the whole war of the rebellion. In 1861 he commanded the Keystone State; was at the capture of Fernandina, Fla. He was engaged with the ironclad off Charleston, S. C. From 1865 to 1866 he was in command of the Osage, and was engaged in the battle of Mobile Bay in August, 1864.

"While in active service in the Navy, off the coast of Africa, he contracted what is known as the 'African fever,' from the effects of which he never fully recovered, and which is shown by the testimony of the naval surgeon on file to have been the ultimate cause of his death. The record of his actual service, as well as the history of his promotions in the Navy, shows that he was an officer of distinguished skill, diligence, and bravery; that his service was long, faithful, and continuous.

"The claimant was married to Admiral Le Roy on the 17th day of November, 1881, at Washington, D. C. Both parties had been married before. There are no children of this marriage."

The widow is aged forty-nine and her sole income is derived from the estate of her late husband, the said estate being unsettled and will not be large.

She is now drawing $50, and in view of the long and honorable service of her husband and the numerous precedents for such action the committee recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

JESSE H. STRICKLAND.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I call up the bill (S. 2832) for the relief of Jesse H. Strickland.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jesse H. Strickland, formerly colonel of the Eighth Regiment of Tennessee Cavalry, United States Volunteers, and for the purpose of prosecuting a claim for pension said Jesse H. Strickland shall be considered as having been duly commissioned and mustered as colonel of the said regiment to date from the 30th day of January, 1863.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2832) for the relief of Jesse H. Strickland, submit the following report:

The case has twice passed the Senate. In the last Congress a similar bill passed this committee and was favorably reported to the House, but was not acted upon.

The facts in the case are fully set forth in the Senate report hereto annexed and made a part hereof.

Believing the case a meritorious one, your committee would recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, submitted the following report (to accompany S. 2832):

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2832) for the relief of Jesse H. Strickland, have examined the same and report:

A similar bill has twice passed the Senate before. These bills, with certain amendments which appear in the bill now under consideration, have been reported favorably in the House on each occasion.

In view of these facts your committee adopt the previous report and recommend the passage of the bill.

REPORT.

The papers filed in this case may be considered as establishing the following facts:

That in January, 1863, Strickland received authority from the Government to recruit and organize a regiment of cavalry of loyal Tennesseans. That he entered upon that duty and raised the Eighth Tennessee Cavalry (so named), but for some reason, which appears only in his own statement, was not mustered as colonel, although he performed the duties for months and was recognized as such.

That in September, 1863, he was sick with intermittent fever and was certified from time to time, from September 4 to September 10, as being unfit for duty, surgeon on last date expressing opinion that he would not be able for duty for several weeks. It is most reasonable to accept the statement that to his sickness and his inability to perform active service his failure to be commissioned was attributable.

That since 1868, as is established by competent medical evidence, he has been more or less disabled by lung trouble, rheumatism, typhoid pneumonia, hemorrhages, and nervous prostration. One other witness places these troubles as far back as 1865, and there is evidence that he was physically sound before entering upon his military duties.

The evidence filed is not such, in the judgment of this committee, as to warrant them in recommending a pension at any arbitrary or fixed rate. We are of opinion, however, that justice would be conserved by giving this claimant a legal standing to prosecute his claim in the Pension Office, and accordingly recommend that the Senate bill pass with the following amendment: Strike out all after the word "volunteers," in the seventh line, and insert "and for the purpose of prosecuting a claim for pension, said Jesse H. Strickland shall be considered as having been duly commissioned and mustered as colonel of said regiment, to date from the 30th day of January, A. D. 1863."

Brief of claim for invalid pension of Jesse H. Strickland.

This bill is to authorize the name of Col. Jesse H. Strickland to be placed on the pension-rolls of the Government.

The reason for asking a special act instead of proceeding by claim in the Pension Bureau is this:

During the civil war Mr. Strickland was a resident of the State of Tennessee and was authorized by President Lincoln, through the War Office, to enlist a regiment of Tennessee troops for the United States service.

Under this authority he did so proceed and enlisted citizens and refugees of his State in numbers finally aggregating seven or eight hundred men. Many months of time and much money was spent in this work. It was performed under promise of being commissioned as colonel, and the regiment was first designated as the Fifth, but afterwards as the Eighth Tennessee Cavalry. As men were mustered in companies were formed and officers appointed, captains, majors, and finally a lieutenant-colonel.

During all this time Mr. Strickland was regarded as a colonel, so designated in official orders, so obeyed when he was in command. As colonel he was in charge of the convalescent camp at Camp Nelson, Kentucky, and as such his name was signed and respected in the Quartermaster's and Medical Departments. But, unfortunately for him, before the work was complete and he mustered into service, he was taken sick and for months was under medical treatment, and from the diseases thus contracted in the line of his duty in the service of the United States he has never recovered.

While thus sick and under medical care, in the fall and winter of 1863, the presence of troops at the front was urgent, so that Andrew Johnson, then military governor of Tennessee, feeling that the public interests must override private rights, consolidated with the Eighth Tennessee Cavalry some 200 recruits obtained by R. V. K. Patten, appointed Patten to be colonel, thus completing the regiment, sending it to the field, and depriving the claimant of his right to be mustered as colonel.

Under these circumstances the Pension Office can not have jurisdiction of his pension claim, and he therefore asks pension by a special act of Congress. He herewith submits testimony to show his sickness in the service and continuously ever since. He is also asking of Congress a legal recognition of his rights as colonel, and evidence of his service as such has been filed with the proper committee of the House of Representatives.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, County of Washington, ss:
In the matter of pensions by special act, Jesse H. Strickland, late colonel Eighth Tennessee Cavalry, United States Volunteers.

On the 30th day of January, 1863, authority was granted me by President Lincoln to recruit and organize a regiment of cavalry of loyal Tennesseans for service in the Federal Army, and while recruiting and in command of the said organization, and in the line of his duty at Camp Nelson, Kentucky, on or about the 1st of September, 1863, he contracted intermittent fever, and while convalescent went to Murfreesborough, Tenn., and thence to Nashville, Tenn., where he had a relapse of his disease, which terminated in typhoid fever and rheumatism, the former having resulted in lung complaint, hemorrhages, and general debility, and which, with rheumatism, have continually existed from time to time since leaving the service.

The applicant has resided in Tennessee, and is now a resident of Brooklyn, Kings County, New York, where he has resided for the past twenty years. That prior to his entry into the United States service he was a man of good, sound physical health, his weight at that time being 175 pounds, and his present weight being 141 pounds. That he is now disabled from obtaining his subsistence by manual labor by reason of his injuries above described, received in the service of the United States, and he therefore makes this declaration for the purpose of being placed on the pension-rolls of the United States.

Personally came before me Francis W. Strickland, a citizen of the town of Brooklyn, county of Kings, State of New York, well known to me to be reputable and entitled to credit, and who, being duly sworn, declares in relation to aforesaid case as follows:

I, Francis W. Strickland, late first lieutenant and commissary of subsistence Eighth Tennessee Cavalry, United States Volunteers, was with the said command at Camp Nelson, Kentucky, on or about May 12, 1863.

On or about November, 1863, on my return through Lexington, Ky., to Cincinnati, on furlough, I met the claimant, and he was suffering from the effects of an attack of typhoid fever and rheumatism and an injury sustained by his horse falling.

Previous to his entering the service he was a robust and healthy man, and ever since his discharge he has been in feeble health, and more or less disabled from the effects of the above diseases.

I have seen the claimant from time to time since his discharge from the military service, and the disability of rheumatism and the results of fever have continued from that time until the present, and he has been unable to perform manual labor.

Personally came before me, a ——— in and for aforesaid county and State, Marcus A. O'Brien, citizen of the town of Washington, District of Columbia, well known to me to be reputable and entitled to credit, and who, being duly sworn, declares in relation to aforesaid case as follows:

That I have known claimant almost continuously for twenty-one years, from 1865 to the present time, 1885; I know him to be, by both report and official military documents that I have seen in his possession, colonel of the Eighth Regiment Tennessee Cavalry, United States Volunteers; I have seen him many times during the above period in Nashville and Murfreesborough, Tenn., New York City, and Brooklyn, N. Y., and I have never known him to be a well or sound, healthy man; I know of his having typhoid fever, rheumatism, and lung trouble when I first became acquainted with him.

It has always been my conviction and belief that his broken-down health was caused by exposure and hardships incurred during his military service to the United States.

And I further declare that I have no interest in said case and am not concerned in its prosecution.

1. I did not know the applicant prior to 1872.

2. Did not treat him at any time previous to the above date.

3. First saw him during the year 1872, when I was called to treat him for chronic pneumonia and pulmonary hemorrhages; saw him several times during that year and the following five years for the same cause.

4. The claimant has been unable for the past ten years to perform any manual labor.

He further declares that he has been a practitioner of medicine for twenty years and that he has no interest, either direct or indirect, in the prosecution of this claim.

STATE OF NEW YORK, County of New York, ss:

Personally came before me Walter R. Gillette, a citizen of New York, in the county of New York and State of New York, well known to me to be reputable and entitled to credit, and who, being duly sworn, declares in relation to the aforesaid case as follows:

That he is a practicing physician, and that he has been acquainted with said soldier for about eighteen years and that he has known him intimately, having been his family physician for five years. I first became acquainted with Colonel Strickland December 1, 1868, he at that time being an employé of the New York post-office, I being at that time physician and medical examiner of the same.

I first called on him December 1, 1868, and found him in a precarious state of health, suffering with lung trouble and rheumatism. Again, in March, 1869, I treated him for typhoid pneumonia. Again, in December, 1869, for rheumatism. In spring of 1870, hemorrhages and nervous prostration. Again, in spring of 1871, pleuro-pneumonia. I advised his resigning his position to prolong life, as I considered him totally unable to perform manual labor.

He further declares that he has been a practitioner of medicine for twenty-two years and that he has no interest, either direct or indirect, in the prosecution of this claim.

WALTER R. GILLETTE,
149 West Twenty-third street, New York.

Mr. KILGORE. If I caught correctly the latter portion of this bill, it is not a bill which can be considered at a Friday evening session.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Except that the bill proposes to establish the rank of this soldier, it is in the same form as other bills which are passed regularly.

Mr. KILGORE. Is not the bill subject to a point of order as one which can not be considered at a Friday evening session? We can only consider at these Friday evening sessions private pension bills, bills for the removal of political disabilities, and bills for the removal of charges of desertion.

Mr. FARQUHAR. This is a Senate bill, and has been reported in this House by the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. KILGORE. That would not give it the necessary standing.

Mr. MORRILL. Oh, yes; the order expressly covers private bills reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. FARQUHAR. There is no question at all that the bill is in order.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

HENRY A. KING.

Mr. ALDERSON. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3952) for the relief of Henry A. King.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be placed on the pension-roll of the United States, subject to the provisions and limitations thereof, the name of Henry A. King, late private of the Clay County, West Virginia, Independent Scouts.

The report (by Mr. LANE) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3952) granting a pension to Henry A. King, submit the following report:

The evidence shows that the soldier served in the late rebellion as a private in Clay County Scouts of West Virginia, an organization serving for the time being under officers of the United States Army from January, 1865, to May, 1863, in March, 1865, the soldier was shot in the left hip while in battle with the enemy, from which injury he has suffered and is greatly suffering now.

This claim was rejected in the Pension Department for the reason that the soldier was in a State organization, and not in the United States service. The committee therefore report the bill back with the recommendation that the same do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

MARY H. CURTIS.

Mr. O'DONNELL. I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 2431) granting a pension to Mary H. Curtis.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and instructed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary H. Curtis, dependent mother of Charles S. Curtis, deceased, late a private in Company B, First Vermont Heavy Artillery.

Sec. 2. That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

The report (by Mr. BELKNAP) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2431) granting a pension to Mary H. Curtis, submit the following report:

The soldier, Charles S. Curtis, son of claimant, served as a member of Company B, First Vermont Heavy Artillery, for nearly three years. He was discharged from the service at the end of the war and went home in greatly impaired health and died from the effects of disease contracted in the service, a very short time after his discharge, without having made an application for pension. He left a widow, but no children. The widow remarried ten months after the soldier's death, and no pension has ever been granted to any one on account of the soldier's service and death.

Evidence is shown that the soldier contributed to the support of his parents in his youth and that the mother is now old, in a destitute condition, and dependent upon others for support, she being afflicted by a disease which is incurable (cancer). She is truly dependent, and is deprived of the support of her son by the casualties of war. Therefore, your committee, believing the claim a very meritorious one, recommend the passage of the bill with an amendment striking out section 2 of the bill.

The amendment recommended by the committee, striking out section 2 of the bill, was read and agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

JOSEPH H. SCOOPMIRE.

Mr. MARTIN, of Indiana. I ask consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3194) granting a pension to Joseph H. Scoopmire.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Joseph H. Scoopmire, Company H, Sixth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, at the rate of $36 per month.

The report (by Mr. MARTIN, of Indiana) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, having had under consideration the bill (S. 3194) granting a pension to Joseph H. Scoopmire, adopt as our own the report of the Senate committee, which is as follows, to wit:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3194) granting a pension to Joseph H. Scoopmire, Company H, Sixth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, have examined the same and report:

That the claimant is now a pensioner at the rate of $24 per month for gunshot wound in the left side. He applies for an increase equivalent to that of total loss of leg, $36 per month. This application for increase has been rejected by the Pension Bureau on the ground that he has some use of his left foot and leg.

From the evidence we think he has some physical use of the foot and leg, but no practical use of the same whatever. The latest evidence taken in 1899 shows that he walks with the assistance of a cane or a crutch and that he is totally incapacitated from manual labor by reason of the wound or its effects. It appears from the evidence of Drs. Olmsted, Hicks, and others that the left hip and leg of the soldier are disabled by reason of a gunshot wound in the left thigh. The ball having crushed the bone, going in and out, the whole leg is atrophied. He is in as bad a condition as if it had been amputated above the knee.

As the result of the wound there is atrophy of the extensor muscles of the leg and thigh with complete paralysis of these muscles, preventing him from extending the limb and causing him to fall forward in attempting to walk over uneven ground. He is completely incapacitated from any manual labor. We think from the weight of evidence it is very satisfactorily shown in the case that the injured limb and foot are wholly useless. We think the increase ought to be granted, at least to the amount of $36 per month, and we therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

LEWIS SOLOMON.

Mr. STRUBLE. I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 8890) granting an increase of pension to Lewis Solomon, a private in Company A, First Indiana Infantry, Mexican war service.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay Lewis Solomon, a private of Company A, First Indiana Infantry, Mexican war service, a pension of $72 per month, in lieu of that he is now receiving, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. DE LANO) is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8890) increasing the pension of Lewis Solomon, have considered the same and beg leave to submit the following report:

The claimant was a private in Company A, First Indiana Volunteers, Mexican war, and served from June 17, 1846, to June 16, 1847. He also rendered almost four years of service during the war of the rebellion, and while serving in Company D, Fourth Iowa Volunteers, received a gunshot wound of the left arm, for which he received a pension of $4 per month, until the passage of the act of January 29, 1857, when he elected to take the $8 per month provided by that act for Mexican war service.

The bill provides for an increase of his pension to $72 per month, and in support thereof Dr. A. J. Weeks, of Correctionville, Iowa, states that the claimant is now totally blind and obliged to have constant attendance. He also states that the claimant ought to be allowed enough pension to pay a nurse for taking care of him. He (claimant) is now approaching seventy years of age and dependent upon his children for support. The children are all poor and live upon rented farms.

That the claimant is totally and permanently blind is also shown by the testimony of Dr. J. A. Thornton, of Correctionville, Iowa.

In view of the claimant's age, destitute condition, and blindness, your committee regard the case as a proper one for the favorable consideration of Congress, and the bill is therefore reported back with the recommendation that it do pass, amended, however, as follows:

Strike out the words "seventy-two," in line 6, and substitute in lieu thereof the word "forty," so as to allow a pension at $40 per month.

The amendment reported by the committee, to strike out "seventy-two," in line 6, and insert "forty," so as to make the pension $40 a month, was read and agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

EMMA CHAPMAN.

Mr. WILSON, of Missouri. I ask the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5265) granting a pension to Emma Chapman.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of (Mrs.) Emma Chapman for her services as army nurse during the late war of the rebellion, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 a month.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

JOHN E. WALTON.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I desire to call up the bill (S. 2076) granting an increase of pension to John E. Walton.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John E. Walton, late of Company C, One hundredth Pennsylvania Volunteers, and pay him at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of the pension he is now receiving under certificate No. 176641.

The report (by Mr. WILSON, of Kentucky) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, having examined the bill for increasing the pension of John E. Walton, beg leave to say that the facts in the case are so fully set forth in the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions that the said report is adopted as our own report, and is herewith presented.

Amend by striking out the word "fifty" and inserting "forty."

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Pensions, submitted the following report (to accompany bill S. 2076):

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2076) granting a pension to John E. Walton, Company C, One hundredth Pennsylvania Volunteers Infantry, have examined the same and report:

Walton was a private in Company C, One hundredth Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry; he enlisted in 1861; was finally discharged in 1864. He was wounded severely in the leg at the second battle of Bull Run, for which wound he receives a pension of $6 per month. In 1887 he applied for an increase on account of loss of eye-sight.

The claim was rejected at the Pension Department upon the opinion of the medical examiner that an affection of the eyes which did not manifest itself coincidentally with an attack of malarial fever could not, after the expiration of a number of years, be traceable to that disease. The preponderance of medical testimony in the case, however, is strongly against the conclusions of the medical examiner referred to, or rather goes to show that whatever may have been the facts about its early manifestation, the disease of the claimant's eyes is due to malarial poison which dates back to 1862.

Three physicians of good repute make affidavit that this disease of the eyes is the effect of malarial poison. A medical board testifies to the same thing, so that in fact the expert testimony is in the ratio of 5 to 1. The physicians do not dispute the theory of the official examiner that the disease must have manifested itself at the time of the attack of malaria, or else it is not traceable thereto, but they simply declare that the affection of the eyes as it now exists is due to that cause.

Dr. Bentley, of Bismarck, says:

"His system is full of malarial disease and his eyes the objective point of its chief manifestation."

Dr. Harris, of Mason City, Iowa, says he has practiced medicine and surgery for thirty-five years; that he treated Walton in 1878 and 1879 for malarial fever; in 1885 he examined him again and found him almost totally blind. He adds that he has no doubt at all that Walton's blindness is to be traced to the malarial fever in his system.

Dr. J. W. Thompson, a noted specialist of St. Paul, says:

"I have been engaged in the practice of medicine and surgery for twenty-three years, ten years in the general and thirteen years in the special practice of diseases of the eye and ear; first treated Walton in 1885; began treating him for his eyes. He was also suffering from a chronic hepatic trouble which had its origin in malarial poison; the eye trouble was a sequel to the hepatic disease, as shown by the periodical character of the inflammation, which was usually much aggravated every third day. It yielded some to powerful treatment, but as often relapsed, and in this manner has continued until his eyes are practically ruined."

The doctor treated Walton for a year and a half, and adds:

"He (Walton) is permanently disabled by the injury to his eyes to the extent of at least three-fourths as compared with a sound able-bodied man."

The medical examining board in 1888 say:

"It is, in our judgment, probable that the disease was incurred in the service as he claims, and that it has not been aggravated by vicious habits. He is, in our judgment, entitled to a 6-13 rating for the disability caused by the gunshot wound in right leg, and a total first grade caused by disease of eyes resulting from malarial fever."

The medical examiner of the bureau says that the weight of medical opinion is to the effect that the character of the appellant's eye affection is such that it can not be medically accepted as a pathological sequence of malarial poisoning in the service. In a letter dated October 14, 1898, which is on file with the papers, the appellant states that up to the year 1878 or 1879 his eyes were all right.

In the certificate of the medical examination of appellant by Examining Surgeon Conway on May 26, 1876, made under his original declaration for pension, no mention is made of eye disease, etc.

I find by an examination of the letter of claimant referred to that he says "practically there was nothing the matter with my eyes prior to 1865," but he goes on to state that for many years they had blurred at times and filled with water, which he had difficulty in wiping away fast enough to enable him to see. A curious corroboration both of the theory of the medical examiner and of the opinion of the physicians who have examined him and testify that the disease of the eyes is traceable to malaria is found in a letter of one of his comrades which has evidently been overlooked by the medical expert in the Pension Bureau, and of which Walton himself is probably ignorant, as it is brought out by the Commissioner of Pensions direct from the witness in response to a letter from the Department. In view of all the facts this is quite important.

When Walton made his application for an increase he filed an affidavit from one of his comrades living at Washington, Pa. The affidavit simply stated that Walton had the fever and ague, accompanied with violent chills, while at or near James Island, in South Carolina, in 1862. The Department wrote to Mr. Ribb, the comrade referred to, asking him to state in his own way and in his own handwriting all the facts within his personal knowledge relating to the case. Ribb thereupon replied, saying:

"All that I recollect about John E. Walton is that he was taken sick and I carried his meals to him. If I remember right he had malarial fever. He complained of his eyes hurting him. It is so far back that I can not remember much. He was a tent-mate of mine or I would have forgotten this."

The Commissioner wrote to the postmaster at Washington, Pa., asking for the reputation for truth of Henry Ribb, and received a reply stating that the reputation of Ribb for truth was good. The evidence of a continuation of malarial fever and chills and fever from 1862 to the present time is established by many witnesses who come from various places where Walton has resided since the war.

His colonel, himself an eminent physician, Doctor Leasure, now dead, but who was well known to the chairman of this committee, speaks in the very highest terms of Walton, as does also the adjutant-general of the State of Minnesota, who has made many efforts to have the case considered; also a large number of the members of the Dakota Legislature and many others, who all testify to the good character of the applicant. Walton has expended upwards of $5,000 in the effort to have his sight restored, and is now destitute and dependent upon the day labor of his wife for support.

In my opinion the preponderance of testimony is in favor of the claim set up by the applicant, and I therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The amendment reported by the committee, striking out "fifty" and inserting "forty," so as to make the pension $40 a month, was read and agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

GEORGE MURRAY.

Mr. WHITING. I ask the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 10083) for the relief of George Murray.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to admit the claim for heart disease and deafness in the case of George Murray, of Company G, Eighth Regiment Michigan Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. BELKNAP) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10083) granting additional pension to George Murray, submit the following report:

George Murray enlisted in Company G, Eighth Michigan Cavalry, on December 15, 1862, and was honorably discharged July 29, 1865. During this period he suffered a four months' imprisonment in Andersonville, where he contracted scurvy, for which he is pensioned at the rate of $6 a month. The soldier has applied for pension for heart disease and deafness, but his claim is rejected on the ground that origin in service is not established.

The regimental surgeon who treated him can not be found, but F. S. Boynton, captain of Company L, Eighth Michigan Cavalry, testifies that he was intimately acquainted with George Murray and that he complained of deafness and heart disease while yet in the service, brought on by hardships incident to the service, and that he was badly disabled on his return from prison.

Neighbors testify that Mr. Murray immediately after returning from service complained to them of both deafness and heart disease, and medical testimony shows treatment for heart disease at this time. Soldier's prior soundness is shown.

Dr. J. G. Totten, who has treated him since 1875, says he has often thought his visits would be of little avail, as soldier was "so bad he might drop dead at any moment."

Board of surgeons report a distressing condition from scurvy, digestion impaired on account of inability to masticate food, and in report of November 30, 1891, they say that they believe irregular heart action is sympathetic; left auditory nerve shows points of ulceration, and claimant can not hear a watch tick even at contact with left ear.

Special Examiner Charles H. Thomas, in his report of August 20, 1888, says: "I think it will be impossible to show origin in service, as pensioner says he did not complain to comrades. I am of the opinion that disease of heart is a sequence of scurvy and prison life, and recommend its admission. I believe there is merit in the claim for deafness, but that it will be very difficult to prove. Deafness may be, and probably is, due to scurvy and life at Andersonville."

Special Examiner Hausted reports a belief that claim for heart disease has merit.

Special Examiner Pettiman does not think origin in service proven, but this opinion is based simply upon the facts upon which the other examiners recommended admission of claim.

Believing from the evidence that this claim is just and that Congress in granting the relief sought will effect but a simple act of justice, we return the bill with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

W. H. OBRIEN.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Tennessee. I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 5145) granting a pension to W. H. Obrien.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and required to place the name of W. H. Obrien, of Tennessee, late a private of the Fourth Tennessee Infantry, on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and restrictions of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. TAYLOR, of Tennessee) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5145) granting a pension to W. H. Obrien, submit the following report:

W. H. Obrien, or O'Brien, enlisted in November, 1862, while residing in Carter County, Tennessee, as a soldier under Lieut. A. C. Foundren, then a recruiting officer for the Fourth Regiment Tennessee Cavalry. Claimant, in company with about eighty other recruits, under the leadership of one G. W. Gray, left home to join the command at Camp Nelson, Kentucky, some time in December, 1862.

Their route was through a country held and occupied by the enemy for a distance of more than 130 miles. It became necessary to travel at night, and to secrete themselves during the day in the mountains to avoid capture. About the 1st of January, 1863, these men were attacked by a squad of Confederate cavalry, near Moccasin Gap, Scott County, Virginia. Claimant, with many others, was taken prisoner and put in jail at Knoxville, Tenn., and thence taken to Mobile, Ala.

After more than twelve months' confinement, claimant made his escape and scouted his way back home, where he remained secreted until about March, 1864, when he again made an attempt to make his way to the Federal lines at Knoxville, Tenn., which point he reached in April, 1864. He reported for duty, but he was so much disabled by reason of rheumatism and emaciation, due to his long confinement in Confederate prison and the exposure he was subjected to on his long journey after escape and hiding out to escape recapture, that he was rejected by the mustering officer. His name was never placed upon the rolls of the command in which he enlisted, hence has no title under the general pension laws.

The fact of claimant's enlistment and capture while en route to his command is shown by the testimony of Lieutenant Foundren, who also testifies that claimant, upon his return from Confederate prison, was rejected because of rheumatism contracted during captivity.

Treatment for rheumatism at return from prison and ever since is shown by the testimony of David Bell, M. D.

Claimant, although not regularly mustered into the service, was an enlisted man of the Army, and because of his enlistment was captured and exposed to hardships which resulted in his permanent disability.

There are numerous precedents which warrant your committee in reporting favorably on the accompanying bill, and they therefore return the same with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

JOHN N. HARRIS.

Mr. McRAE. I ask the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 10154) to increase the pension of John N. Harris.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay John N. Harris, of Gurdon, Ark., late a private in Company H, commanded by Captain Crump, in the First Mississippi Regiment, commanded by Jefferson Davis, in the war with Mexico, a pension at the rate of $20 a month, in lieu of that which he now receives, to take effect from and after the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. DE LANO) is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10154) granting an increase of pension to John N. Harris, have considered the same and report:

The claimant was a private in Company H, First Mississippi Volunteers, and served honorably in the war with Mexico.

He is now a pensioner at $3 per month on account of said service.

The evidence filed in support of the bill shows conclusively that the claimant is about sixty-nine years old, and for the past year has had no use of his legs by reason of paralysis. His disability is such that he requires the constant attention of an attendant. It is further shown that the claimant is poor, and that he has not sufficient property or income to afford him a comfortable support.

In view of the facts stated, your committee think the relief prayed for should be granted, and the bill is therefore returned with a favorable recommendation.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

URSULA LUCRETIA HAIGHT.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, by unanimous consent, the House proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3177) granting a pension to Ursula Lucretia Haight.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Ursula Lucretia Haight, widow of William H. Haight, late private Company H, Thirty-ninth Regiment Enrolled Militia of Missouri.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3177) granting a pension to Ursula Lucretia Haight, submit the following report:

The Senate report clearly sets forth the facts and is hereby adopted.

SENATE REPORT.

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3177) granting a pension to Ursula Lucretia Haight, have examined the same and report:

This claimant is the widow of William H. Haight, deceased, who was a private in Company H, Thirty-ninth Regiment Enrolled Missouri Militia. He enlisted September 10, 1862, at Platte City, Mo., furnished his own horse, and was released from duty January 19, 1863, having served fifty-seven days.

On July 24, 1863, he made application for a pension, alleging "that during his service he was exposed to bad weather, in 1862-'63, and incurred a hacking cough and general breaking down of the system." He was not treated in any hospital, but by his regimental surgeon. The claim was rejected by the Commissioner of Pensions on the ground "that Company H, Thirty-ninth Enrolled Missouri Militia, was a State organization, and disabilities incurred therein are not pensionable under existing laws."

William Davis and Benjamin F. Davis, comrades, swear to incurrence as alleged, and further state—

"That they were intimately acquainted with the soldier up to the date of his death. . . . At the time of his discharge he was weakly, and died from the effects of the cold and cough, and was unfit and unable to perform any hard manual labor from that time to the time of his death. He could do light chores only, and he got worse and worse, year by year, till he went to the Soldiers' Home and died, and all of this was the result and effect of his exposure while in the service and in the line of duty."

This affidavit as to continuance is fully corroborated by other testimony, and also as to soundness prior to enlistment.

His enlistment and service is verified by the adjutant-general of Missouri, and his certificate is in the papers in the case.

Dr. A. L. Van Duxen, of Leavenworth, Kan., swears to—"An acquaintance of twenty years, and treated him frequently during that time. About fifteen years ago he had severe dysentery and several attacks since, always being weak with indigestion, unable to endure fatigue or heat, and at last suffering with paralysis. He has been a very feeble man ever since I knew him."

This affidavit was made January 13, 1890. He was admitted to the Soldiers' Home May 7, 1886, and died January 12, 1888. Cause of death, "locomotor ataxia."

Your committee are of the opinion that the disability and subsequent death of the soldier are due to the disability incurred in the service as alleged, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time.

WIATT PARISH.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, the House proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 10334) granting a pension to Wiatt Parish.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the conditions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Wiatt Parish, late a soldier in the Black Hawk war, at the rate of $30 per month.

The report (by Mr. PARRETT) is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10334) granting a pension to Wiatt Parish, have had the same under consideration and respectfully report as follows:

The claimant served from June 17, 1832, to August 16, 1832, in Captain Bowman's company of Illinois Volunteers in the Black Hawk war.

In the declaration for pension filed at the Pension Bureau October 9, 1874, he declares that while in said service and line of duty he contracted measles, which resulted in pain in back, knees, lungs, and eyes. He also declares that he contracted a hydrocele of the right side from riding while in said service.

That the claimant contracted measles while serving in Captain Bowman's company is established by the testimony of several of his comrades. It is also shown that he has been a sufferer for many years from rheumatism, disease of the testicles, and an affection of the throat, but the claim was rejected by the Pension Bureau on the ground that the testimony failed to establish the allegation that said disabilities were contracted in the service as the result of measles and horseback riding.

The claimant is now about seventy-six years old, badly disabled, and very poor. He is obliged to depend upon relatives for support.

In view of the facts stated your committee recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendment: Strike out the word "thirty," in line 7, and substitute in lieu thereof the word "twenty."

The amendment recommended by the committee was adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

MARY J. EADIE.

On motion of Mr. SMYSER, by unanimous consent, the House proceeded to consider the bill (S. 848) granting a pension to Mary J. Eadie.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary J. Eadie, sister of John Eadie, first Lieutenant Company C, One hundred and fifteenth Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. YODER) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 848) granting a pension to Mary J. Eadie, submit the following report:

The facts in the case are set forth in the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, which your committee adopt as their own and likewise recommend the passage of the bill.

SENATE REPORT.

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 848) granting a pension to Mary J. Eadie, sister of John Eadie, first Lieutenant Company C, One hundred and fifteenth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, have examined the same and report:

That this bill has been already before the committee at the present session and was reported adversely on the 21st of January, 1890, on the ground that there was no proof of the circumstances or identity of Mary J. Eadie as sister of John Eadie, the deceased soldier mentioned in the bill.

The bill was indefinitely postponed on this adverse report, but was afterwards reconsidered and recommitted to this committee, since which time three affidavits have been filed showing the identity of Mary J. Eadie as a sister of John Eadie, the deceased soldier, who was killed by the explosion of the steamer Sultanna, while in the line of his duty, in 1865. It is also shown that said Mary J. Eadie, the sister, is a confirmed invalid, confined most of the time to her room, not able to earn her support in any way, and is dependent for her support upon the labor of a sister, who is a dressmaker in very poor circumstances.

These sisters are the only surviving members of the family, and have no property or other means. The deceased soldier was never married. His father and mother and brothers are dead. His mother drew a pension while living. Both the mother and sister named in the bill were dependent upon the soldier during his lifetime. Under these circumstances we think it is just that the pension should now go to the sister, and we therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time.

FANNIE A. PUTNEY.

On motion of Mr. BRICKNER, by unanimous consent, the House proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 9371) for the relief of Fannie A. Putney.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Fanny A. Putney, widow of Elum

Putney, formerly a member of Capt. Thaddeus Sheldon's company of New York Militia, war of 1812.

The report (by Mr. DE LANO) is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9371) granting a pension to Fannie A. Putney, have considered the same and report:

Elum Putney, the claimant's deceased husband, served in Capt. Thaddeus Sheldon's company of New York Militia, war of 1812, from September 11, 1814, to September 22, 1814. He was paid for twelve days' service. It is stated on the rolls of the company that the soldier was "discharged 18th September, 1814, at Burlington, distance from place of residence 75 miles."

The claimant filed an application for pension in the Pension Bureau, but the same was rejected on the ground that the soldier did not serve the requisite length of time (fourteen days) to entitle her under the general law.

The claimant's loyalty and identity are fully established by the testimony filed with her application. She is now about eighty years old.

The soldier's service lacked but two days of being of sufficient duration to entitle his widow to a pension, and in view of her great age your committee are of the opinion that it would be but an act of justice to grant the relief prayed for.

The passage of the bill is recommended.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly engrossed, and read the third time.

MARTIN BRACHALL.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, by unanimous consent, the House proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 10902) to grant a pension to Martin Brachall.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Martin Brachall, who was a private in Capt. J. M. Gillespie's company, Illinois Militia, in the Black Hawk war, and pay him a pension of $30 per month.

The report (by Mr. DE LANO) is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10902) granting a pension to Martin Brachall, have considered the same and report:

The claimant was a private in Capt. J. M. Gillespie's company, Illinois Militia, and served thirty-one days in the Black Hawk war in 1832.

His residence and post-office address is Danville, Ill.

He asks a pension of $30 per month by special act, declaring under oath that he is nearly eighty-two years old, feeble, with no property, and without any means of support whatever except manual labor. He states further that his father served seven years and six months in the Revolutionary war and was pensioned therefor till his death in 1811; that his father also served in the war of 1812.

H. P. Blackburn, of Danville, Ill., states on oath that the claimant is very old and feeble and makes his living entirely by working at the tailor trade, and that he is a man of unquestioned veracity, honest, sober, and industrious, but has no property whatsoever.

In view of this claimant's service, his great age and dependence, your committee recommend the passage of the bill granting him a pension at the rate of $30 per month, and the bill is amended accordingly.

The amendment recommended by the committee was adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I wish I could get permission of the House to pass that bill now. I am awfully busy and do not know that I can be here on the next Friday session.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the bill will be put upon its passage.

There being no objection, the bill was passed.

THOMAS EGAN.

On motion of Mr. CARUTH, by unanimous consent, the House proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7718) granting a pension to Thomas Egan.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions of the pension laws, the name of Thomas Egan, late a private in Company G, Sixth Missouri Infantry.

The report (by Mr. WILSON, of Kentucky) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7718) granting a pension to Thomas Egan, submit the following report:

Thomas Egan served as private of Company G, Sixth Missouri Volunteers, from June 17, 1861, to June 25, 1864, when discharged by reason of expiration of term of service. He applied for pension December 20, 1883, arguing that while engaged with the enemy near Florence, Ala., in September, 1863, a piece of the cap of the gun struck the upper lid of his right eye, from which injury the eye became diseased and continued to be sore until in March, 1880, he lost the sight of the said eye entirely; also that from sympathy the other eye became affected, and that since March, 1883, he has been totally blind.

There is no record of the injury, and claimant himself states that he received no treatment therefor in service, but at the advice of the regimental surgeon, now dead, kept the eye bandaged.

The case has been very thoroughly specially examined and no adverse testimony has been obtained, nor do any suspicious features appear in the several medical examinations. But the evidence as to incurrence of the disability is not satisfactory to the Pension Office, hence the rejection of the claim.

The evidence shows conclusively that claimant was a very robust man and of good eye-sight at enlistment. His officers and comrades remember little about him, he being a stranger to them at the time of his entry into service and having had no associations with them since discharge by reason of his residence in a State east of that in which the command was organized. Neither is it strange that an injury apparently so slight as that received by the claimant should be remembered after years of separation.

But the evidence filed in support of the claim, as well as that obtained by special examination, shows conclusively that immediately after return home, although otherwise in good health, claimant's eyes were seriously affected and continued to grow worse until, as heretofore stated, he became totally blind in the injured eye in 1880, and also in the other eye in 1883.

The claimant is shown to be a man of regular habits and truthful. He has an aged wife and four small children, is without means, and, as shown by the statement of the Hon. A. S. Willis, late a member of this House, the entire family is supported by charity.

Having served his adopted country faithfully for three years, and being now an object of charity, in the absence of any adverse feature in the case your committee feel inclined to solve whatever doubt there may exist as to the origin of the disability in favor of the claimant, and therefore report favorably on the bill and ask that it do pass, amended, however, by adding after the word "Infantry," in line 6, the words "and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month."

The amendment recommended by the committee was adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

CAROLINE HAYES.

On motion of Mr. COGSWELL, by unanimous consent, the House proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 1433) granting a pension to Caroline Hayes.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay Caroline Hayes, daughter of Nathaniel Hayes, deceased, late of Second Company of Sharpshooters of the Twenty-second Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers, a pension of $20 per month.

The report (by Mr. FLICK) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1433) granting a pension to Caroline Hayes, submit the following report:

Caroline Hayes is the only child of Nathaniel Hayes, who died while serving as private of the Second Company of Sharpshooters of the Twenty-second Regiment of Massachusetts Volunteers. She was pensioned after the widow's death and remained on the pension-roll until February 7, 1879, when she reached the age of sixteen years. It also appears in evidence that she is now, and has been for many years, insane and under guardianship. She has no means nor income of any kind and is kept out of the almshouse by the contributions of the Grand Army post of the town in which she resides. There is no possibility of improvement in her condition.

The case is similar to others in which Congress has taken favorable action. The bill is therefore returned with the recommendation that it do pass, amended, however, by striking out all after the word "of," in line 7, and insert therein instead the words "eighteen dollars per month through her legally constituted guardian."

The amendment recommended by the committee was adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed it was accordingly read the third time.

VIRGINIA L. M. EWING.

On motion of Mr. YODER, by unanimous consent, the House proceeded to consider the bill (S. 973) granting an increase of pension to Virginia L. M. Ewing.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Virginia L. M. Ewing, widow of Charles Ewing, brigadier-general United States Volunteers, at the rate of $50 per month.

The report (by Mr. YODER) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 973) granting an increase of pension to Virginia L. M. Ewing, have had the same under consideration and beg leave to submit the following report:

The facts in the case are set forth in the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, which is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 973) granting an increase of pension to Virginia L. M. Ewing, have examined the same and report:

The beneficiary under the bill, widow of the late Brig. Gen. Charles Ewing, is now in receipt of a pension of $30 a month, which is increased by its terms to $50. The committee find the following to be a fair statement of the services performed by General Ewing and of the claims of his widow and children:

General Charles Ewing, youngest son of the late Thomas Ewing, of Ohio, before the breaking out of the rebellion, was successfully engaged in the practice of the law in St. Louis. When the indications of the rebellion became threatening he relinquished his practice and applied himself to military studies preparatory to an offer of his services to the Government in the event that war ensued; and it so occurred that when his brother-in-law, General Sherman, was appointed colonel of the Thirtieth United States Infantry, Charles Ewing was commissioned captain in the same regiment. He served through the war, from 1861 to 1865, earning, by special capacity, endurance, and courage, promotion to the rank of brigadier-general.

The quality of these services is attested not merely by the official army records, but by the testimony of the General of the Army, who, by reason of his confidence in his relative and friend, charged him with difficult missions and imposed upon him extraordinary burdens, and especially in the Vicksburg campaign and on Sherman's marches to the sea and from Savannah to Raleigh, in which he suffered exposure that sowed the seeds of the malady of which he died; and the fact that a large share of his disabilities occurred while he bore the responsibilities and performed the labors of important commands entitles the case to equitable consideration.

There is a large amount of evidence before the committee showing the exceptional value of General Ewing's services and of his hardships and exposures, which left him in broken health and culminated in his premature death, leaving seven children to the care of his widow; but the committee confine themselves to that contained in the letter from Surgeon-General Moore, hereto appended, whose conclusions they adopt.

The bill is heartily approved and its passage recommended.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time.

JOHN O. MATHIS.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, of New Jersey, by unanimous consent, the House proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 1186) granting a pension to John O. Mathis.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John O. Mathis, late of Company G, Fourth Regiment New Jersey Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. BELKNAP) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1186) granting a pension to John O. Mathis, submit the following report:

The application of the claimant for a pension was rejected by the Pension Office November 21, 1885, for the reason that there was no record at the War Department showing that he had suffered from rheumatism while in the service, and his "inability to furnish competent testimony," showing that the same was contracted in the service.

The claimant enlisted in the service August 17, 1861, and was discharged at the expiration of his term of service, August 20, 1864. During these three years the claimant was twice in hospital and once (at the battle of Gaines's Mills, Virginia) was taken prisoner, remaining a prisoner from June 27, 1862, to August 5, 1863. He claims that at the battle of Gettysburg, by reason of the exposure he suffered there, he contracted rheumatism.

Dr. P. K. Hilliard, his family physician, testifies that after claimant returned from the Army, and during 1865, he treated claimant for rheumatism. This treatment continued until March, 1866, when claimant left his neighborhood.

Dr. M. W. Reeves testifies to treating claimant for sciatica or neuralgia, and believes his disability results from exposure in the service. He further testifies to the present existence of the disability.

Franklin Adams, Joseph P. Adams, Caleb W. Auren, Israel A. Craumer, and John H. Austin, neighbors and acquaintances of the claimant, testify to his good health before entering the Army and his disability on his return and since. These men are well known in their community, and, like the claimant, are of high personal standing. We think established beyond question by the testimony in the case the fact that he was sound when he entered the service and was disabled when he left it. Because of the death of comrades and the failure of recollection of surgeons, who were treating daily in the field hundreds of men, he can not prove the exact origin of the disability, save by his own oath, he ought not to be debarred from the benefit of our pension laws. We recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and was accordingly engrossed and read the third time.

JOHN B. REED.

On motion of Mr. FORMAN, by unanimous consent, the House proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 8016) increasing the pension of John B. Reed, late lieutenant-colonel of the One hundred and thirtieth Regiment Illinois Volunteers.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to continue the name of John B. Reed, late lieutenant-colonel of the One hundred and thirtieth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, at the rate of $75 per month, in lieu of the pension of $25 per month.

The report (by Mr. LANE) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8016) for the relief of John B. Reed, late lieutenant-colonel of the One hundred and thirtieth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, beg leave to make the following report:

We find that Col. John B. Reed organized a company of volunteers in August, 1862, in Bond County, Ill.; was elected captain of said company; that they were ordered to rendezvous at Belleville, and from there to Springfield, Ill., and attach to the One hundred and thirtieth Regiment Illinois Volunteers; that the said Reed was commissioned as major of said regiment and served in that capacity until July 5, 1864, when he was promoted to lieutenant-colonel of said regiment, vice James H. Matheny, resigned; that said regiment participated in the Red River expedition at the battle of Mansfield; Colonel Reed, the only field officer present at that engagement, was severely wounded by a rifle ball passing through the upper lobe of the right lung and the entire body; that he was captured and taken to Tyler, Tex., as a prisoner of war; that upon his partial recovery he was paroled. He returned to the Union lines, was exchanged, and again took command of the regiment. Colonel Reed was the only field officer who remained with his regiment from the time of its organization to its muster out.

The committee does not deem it important to follow this gallant soldier through all his services in the war of the rebellion, but from an examination of the history and roster of the One hundred and thirtieth Illinois, filed with the committee, we have no hesitation in saying that his conduct upon all occasions was deemed by his superior officers as meritorious, having received several promotions for gallantry on the field; that he receives now a pension of $25 per month for the gunshot wound heretofore mentioned; that while on duty at McIntosh Bluff with his men tearing down a log building he received an injury to his leg which caused the formation of varicose veins, and which disability is continued to the present time and is at times very serious, requiring the application of rubber bands, and is 2½ inches larger in diameter than the other leg, for which disability he has never applied for and receives no pension; that some years ago, as the remote effect of his wound, he had a very severe stroke of paralysis, from which, as appears by the affidavit of reputable physicians, he has never recovered, and never will, and he is totally disqualified from performing any manual labor.

He has been in moderate circumstances, but by long-continued sickness and his inability to attend to business has lost his property and is now very poor and unable to support himself and family. He is a man of excellent habits and standing in his community. We therefore recommend that said bill be amended by striking out the words "seventy-five" in line 3 of said bill, and that the word "fifty" be inserted in lieu thereof, and that the bill as so amended do pass.

The amendment recommended by the committee was adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

EDGAR M. CHERRY.

On motion of Mr. HALL, by unanimous consent, the House proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2043) granting a pension to Edgar M. Cherry.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Edgar M. Cherry, late a member of Company A, Thirty-second Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers, and pay him a pension of $24 a month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The report (by Mr. FLICK) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2043) granting a pension to Edgar M. Cherry, submit the following report:

Your committee, having had said bill under consideration, adopt the report of the Senate committee, which is as follows:

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2043) granting a pension to Edgar M. Cherry, have examined the same and report:

"The claimant under the bill, late a member of the Thirty-second Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers, while in service and battle, received a gunshot wound in the face, which resulted in total loss of sight of the right eye, with partial loss of sight of the left, partial loss of nose, with entire stoppage of the breathing apertures, forcing all breathing through the open mouth, and producing chronic sore throat and a disfigurement most painful to witness and endure.

"For these disabilities the claimant has been drawing pension at from $8 to $16, of which last rate he is now in receipt. His trade is that of miller, which his wound, productive of the disabilities above described, compels him to abandon, as it does also to forego every employment in which dust and heat or light and sight are incident or requisite. His injuries thus reduce him practically to a condition of blindness, while the constant irritation to which he is subject renders his state in some respects even worse than that. These facts are shown by the testimony and have influenced the Pension Bureau from time to time to increase his rating. To enable the committee to act with understanding and justice the claimant made photographic proof of his wound; and, if there had been no other testimony than the fact that the disfigurement thus pictured was incurred in service and on duty, it would have justified the approval of the bill, which is hereby made, with the recommendation of the committee that the same do pass."

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time.

ELLEY C. FOLGER.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, my attention has been called to House bill 2174, to remove charge of desertion from Ellery C. Folger, just passed, where an error in the printing occurs. It reads "August the first, eighteen and sixty-one." I ask unanimous consent to insert the word "hundred," so as to read "eighteen hundred and sixty-one." This is the bill of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McCOMAS]. There being no objection, the amendment was adopted.

MRS. F. SELINA BUCHANAN.

On motion of Mr. MANSUR, by unanimous consent, the House proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2036) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. F. Selina Buchanan.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. F. Selina Buchanan, widow of the late McKean Buchanan, of the United States Navy, and pay her a pension of $50 per month, in lieu of the amount she is now receiving.

The report (by Mr. LEWIS) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2036) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. F. Selina Buchanan, submit the following report:

The facts in the case are set forth in the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, which is as follows:

"The petitioner, Mrs. F. Selina Buchanan, is the widow of the late McKean Buchanan, who, at the time of his death, March 18, 1871, was a pay director in the United States Navy, with the rank of commodore (the highest attainable by officers of his grade), assimilated to that of brigadier-general in the Army.

"Pay Director Buchanan entered the Navy in 1826 and participated in two wars. By act of Congress, December 21, 1861, limiting the term of active service to forty-five years of service or to sixty-two years of age, he was retired from service, he having been born in 1796. Although by this law permitted to withdraw from active duty, he remained at his post on board the frigate Congress until she was sunk in Hampton Roads, March 9, 1862. During the engagement with the Merrimac on the date named he commanded the berth-deck division and performed gallant service until the sinking of the ship.

"Being at that time sixty-four years of age, the shock to his system was such that his health was seriously undermined, and his death was the result.

"By the act of March 3, 1871, revising the various naval grades, Paymaster Buchanan was raised to the grade of pay director (then newly created), with the rank of commodore, but his death occurred two weeks later, on March 18, 1871, before the issuance of his commission.

"In view of the foregoing facts, of the decedent's long and valuable services, of the widow's advanced age, she being now eighty-six years old, and in view of the further fact that there are now, or were not long since, on the pension-rolls the widows of ten admirals, four commodores, and a number of other officers of the Navy and Marine Corps, receiving $50 per month, your committee recommend that the prayer of the petitioner be granted, and they submit herewith a bill increasing her pension from $30 to $50.

"The bill is reported favorably, with a recommendation that it do pass."

Your committee likewise recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time.

ARTHUR CONNERY.

On motion of Mr. LACEY, by unanimous consent, the House proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4825) granting a pension to Arthur Connery.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place upon the invalid pension-rolls of the United States the name of Arthur Connery, of Company B, Fifty-fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, the rating to be subject to the general pension laws.

The report (by Mr. FLICK) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4825) granting a pension to Arthur Connery, submit the following report:

Arthur Connery was a soldier of Company E, Fifty-fifth Pennsylvania Volunteers. His application for pension was rejected because of want of sufficient corroborative proof of origin of disability. He claimed he was disabled by hernia contracted when on duty near Appomattox, Va., in April, 1865, but he has no hospital record.

Claimant swears that his rupture was produced by marching and carrying his accouterments. A. G. Shortall, recorder of deeds of Schuylkill County, Pennsylvania, testified that he had known the claimant from childhood and that he was sound when he enlisted, and to the same effect is the testimony of James T. Kelley. Thomas Convey, a comrade, testifies that he slept with claimant on the march in Virginia, and that claimant complained and told him he had contracted hernia and was wearing a truss.

L. B. Bandt, surgeon of the Fifty-fifth Pennsylvania, testified that Connery complained of rupture in Virginia, and that he procured a truss for him, and that he believes he contracted hernia in the service, and it was caused by the strain of carrying his accouterments. J. A. Beatty testified that he saw the claimant on his return from the service, and knows he was then ruptured, and in 1882 O. D. Lawson examined claimant and he swears he found him suffering from hernia.

Your committee believe that the proof shows with reasonable clearness that Connery contracted hernia in the service and in line of duty, and therefore recommend the passage of said bill. The bill should be amended by striking out in the fifth line "Company B" and inserting "Company E."

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

HANNAH LEO, WIDOW OF JOHN LEARY, DECEASED.

On motion of Mr. MANSUR, by unanimous consent, the House proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2285) granting a pension to the widow of John Leary, deceased.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of the widow of John Leary, late a first sergeant in Battery F, Third Artillery, United States Army in the war of the rebellion, and pay her at the rate of $20 per month from and after the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. LEWIS) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2285) granting a pension to Hannah Leo, submit the following report:

The facts in the case appear in the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, which is as follows:

"That the claimant, Hannah Leo, widow of John Leary before her second marriage, was, at the time of the death of her first husband, the wife of John Leary, deceased, late a private or sergeant, rated as in general service of the U. S. Army.

"The said John Leary enlisted on the 29th day of July, 1854, and was discharged July 20, 1859, by expiry of term of service. He re-enlisted August 26, 1859, and was assigned to Battery F, Third Artillery; served in the war of the rebellion; was slightly wounded at the battle of Malvern Hill, July 1, 1863; was discharged for disability March 25, 1863, at Baltimore, Md. He again enlisted in the general service in the Adjutant-General's Office in Washington, April 7, 1863, whence he was discharged April 1, 1864. He was in the service in all about ten years.

"The soldier died on December 8, 1872. He left surviving him the claimant, as widow, and four children. All of these except one are now over pensionable age. Their claim for pension was rejected. The widow afterward married a man by the name of Leo, who has since died, leaving her for the second time a widow. Neither husband was a man of any means. She now claims a pension for the service and death of her first husband, Leary, the soldier, died in Washington, December 8, 1872, of pneumonia, as it is certified.

"We find that during his military service he was treated for rheumatism, for incised wound, for diarrhea, for amblyopia, for chronic articular rheumatism. Medical and other testimony shows that at the time of his discharge and afterward he was suffering from lung troubles, appeared consumptive, was treated for the same, and we think it most probable that he died from the effects and results of disease incurred while in the service.

"The widow is now over forty years old, very poor, dependent upon her daily labor for support.

"We recommend the passage of the bill."

Your committee likewise recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

JAMES M. MONROE.

On motion of Mr. PETERS, by unanimous consent, the House proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 8923) increasing the pension of James M. Monroe.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the pension now granted to James M. Monroe for "loss of left leg and part of right foot," as a member of Company G, Forty-second Ohio Volunteer Infantry, be increased to $50 per month.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8923) increasing the pension of James M. Monroe, submit the following report:

The claimant was a private soldier in Company G, Forty-second Ohio Volunteers. At Chickasaw Bayou, near Haines Bluff, in General Sherman's first attack on Vicksburg, on the 28th day of December, 1862, claimant was wounded by a shell from the enemy's battery, which necessitated the immediate amputation of his left leg. The shot also struck his right foot carrying away the three outside toes and their metatarsal bones. The second joint of the second toe is ankylosed, causing it to stand up, and when walking it presses against the great toe causing friction and pain. The cicatrix on the outside of the foot is very tender, therefore claimant is compelled to throw the pressure when standing or walking on the inside of the foot, which produces a large clavi pedum and is very painful.

Claimant is pensioned at $30 per month, which is a specific rate for loss of one leg, and to which amount he is entitled without the disability of the right foot. There being no law by which these two disabilities can be compounded, your committee find this a very meritorious case, and one which can only be reached by special act; therefore recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendment, striking out "$30" and inserting "$50."

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

THOMAS NELSON.

On motion of Mr. LA FOLLETTE, by unanimous consent, the House proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6034) for the relief of Thomas Nelson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Thomas Nelson, late a private in Company E, Third Wisconsin Volunteers, and subsequently second lieutenant of Company E, Forty-fifth Wisconsin Infantry Volunteers, to $45 per month, and pay him such pension from and after the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6034) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Nelson, submit the following report:

Thomas Nelson enlisted in the Third Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry as a private. The records of the War Department show that he received three gunshot wounds, while in action at Dallas, Ga., on the 25th day of May, 1864, two in the left thigh and one in the left leg, below the knee. One of the bullets entered the thigh 6 inches above the knee, cut the cords of the leg, and embedded itself in the thigh bone.

The testimony in the case proves that at the time he was with his company, and in the front rank, charging a Confederate battery, and that the soldier was within 4 or 5 rods of the battery when shot down.

The records in this case at the Pension Bureau show further that when the soldier had partially recovered from these wounds, but while he was still very lame in consequence thereof, he was, on February 3, 1865, promoted and commissioned second lieutenant of the Forty-fifth Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry; that six days later, while on recruiting service, and while descending a flight of stairs, and because of his great lameness and without fault upon his part, he received a severe fall, dislocating his left shoulder and badly fracturing the neck of the left humerus, and also fracturing the middle third of the left humerus, or upper and principal bone of the arm. Respecting the gunshot wounds and this fracture, the records of the Adjutant-General's Office contain the following from E. J. Dahm, assistant surgeon of the Forty-fifth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers, dated June 15, 1865:

"He is unfit for service on account of lameness caused by three wounds, said to have been received in the battle at Dallas, Ga., May 25, 1864, while a private in Company E, Third Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers. One wound is through the fleshy part of right leg, the two others through the left thigh, one of the musket-balls yet remaining in contact with or embedded in the bone. He has also paralysis of the deltoid muscle of the left arm, caused by a fracture of the neck of the humerus, according to a certificate from E. Kramer, surgeon Forty-fifth Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, the accident occurring in the city of Madison, Wis., February 14, 1865, while in the discharge of his duty as an officer."

The medical testimony in the case, in an unbroken line, clearly proves not only an impaired and crippled condition of the arm resulting from said injury, but an imperfect reduction of the dislocation and such an imperfect union of the fracture as to cause a progressive disease of the bone and a wasting of the muscles from that time forward.

In 1875 he was granted a pension for gunshot wound and injury to left shoulder. This was increased from time to time until, with the several general acts increasing pensions of like grade, including the act of August 4, 1890, Lieutenant Nelson was pensioned at $35 per month.

The condition of his arm as early as 1875 was such as to occasion him the greatest suffering. The disease of the bone and muscles had gradually developed. In 1876 the examining surgeon of the Pension Bureau reported that the fracture "produced partial ankylosis of the joint and prevents him from raising his arm up from the side on a line with his body."

In 1877 the examining surgeon says: "There is atrophy of 2 inches of the muscles of the arm, and, in consequence of numbness of the fingers and atrophy of the muscles, he has but little use of the left arm for manual labor."

In 1881 the board of examining surgeons say: "We find much crepitus in the shoulder joint. He can not raise the arm from the shoulder. The arm is quite helpless. Has also suffered a fracture of the left fore-arm, probably, partially at least, in consequence of the helplessness of the arm."

The fractures of the arm between the elbow and wrist were due to his being thrown from a sleigh and falling upon the weakened and diseased arm, producing this additional injury, an accident which would not have befallen him, except for the disabilities incurred in service, for which he was pensioned, the crippled condition of his legs, due to wounds, and the diseased and wasted condition of his arm.

In 1884 the board of examining surgeons say of the original injury to the arm at the shoulder:

"We find a fracture of the neck of left humerus, with partial dislocation inwards of the head of the bone. There is pain on moving the joint, with decided crepitus. The arm is quite useless and can be raised but a short distance from the side. He has, in consequence of loss of control of the arm, suffered several fractures of the fore-arm, a fracture of the olecranon in upper third with bad results, bone uniting at an angle and overlapping, also fracture of radius in lower third and no osseous union."

In July, 1887, the board of examining surgeons say: "Arm hangs helplessly from the shoulder. Fore-arm and hand also helpless." The testimony of his neighbors, of record in the case, is in entire harmony with this medical evidence and establishes beyond question the fact that prior to receiving the fracture of the left fore-arm the old fracture and dislocation of the left humerus and shoulder and the resulting disease of bone and atrophy of muscles had so progressed that as early as 1875, and even before, Lieutenant Nelson had been wholly unable to perform any manual labor of any description and required constant assistance in the ordinary care of his own person.

As the disease of the arm developed, it was attended by constant and increasing pain, extending from the shoulder to the hand.

Several physicians were applied to for relief, and their testimony is a part of the record in this case. They describe the arm as "discolored," as "entirely useless," and the patient's condition as "much worse than as if the arm were gone." Dr. W. W. Gill, a practicing surgeon and physician of Madison, Wis., examined the arm several times, and as early as 1865 advised amputation. He testifies that—

"The indications were that the bone was becoming necrosed. The pain at times was very severe, extending from the shoulder to the fingers. This pain continued growing worse from time to time."

In December, 1890, Lieutenant Nelson was compelled to seek some relief from this increasing disability and suffering, and for that purpose he visited Hahnemann Medical College and Hospital, Chicago. Dr. George A. Hall, professor of the principles and practices of surgery and clinical surgery of that institution, took charge of the case. An examination was made, and an operation was performed by Dr. Hall, December 20, 1890. Dr. Hall testifies that he found the patient had "sustained a fracture of cervical neck of left humerus, also a fracture of middle third of same, and subsequently fracture of both bones below elbow of left arm, upper one-third; following this a fracture of radius 2½ inches above radiocarpal articulation, and the ulna 1 inch above articulation."

The operation and effort to save the arm proved unavailing, and upon the 10th day of October, 1897, Dr. Hall amputated it.

The claimant applied for an increase of his pension to $45 per month, and the medical referee at the Pension Bureau declined to accept the amputation of the arm as resulting from the original dislocation of shoulder and double fracture of the left humerus, and reduced the rate of his pension to $34 per month. The medical referee says, in rendering his decision in the case, that—

"In view of the contradictory statements of Dr. Hall and the statements of our examining surgeons, that there was no necrosis or ulceration in the humerus and upper arm, we must decline to accept his latter statement as sufficient to show that the amputation of the humerus was made necessary by the injury of the left shoulder for which the soldier was pensioned."

As Dr. Hall made two affidavits in relation to the amputation and as certain alleged "contradictory statements" in these two affidavits are assigned as reasons for the opinion of the medical referee, the affidavits are herewith submitted. In the first one, dated December 19, 1897, Dr. Hall testifies:

"That the condition of the arm previous to amputation was as follows: There was non-union of both bones of the fore-arm, for which operation had been made December 20, 1890, and all efforts made for their restoration, but the result was failure. The arm continued useless and helpless, and from the diseased condition of the bones of the fore-arm it was agreed and I believe that further attempt to reduce the integrity of the fore-arm would have been of no avail; that on the 10th day of October, 1897, this affiant amputated said arm at a point a little above the middle of the humerus. The bone at this point was diseased. It having undergone osteomyelitis made the shell very thin and the bone sensitive. The condition of the bone at the time of amputation, the result of former injuries, and also that said amputation was so near the shoulder-joint that it will be impossible for said claimant to use an artificial arm."

In the second affidavit, dated February 7, 1899, he testifies as follows:

"On the 10th day of October, 1897, I amputated the left arm of Thomas Nelson, the claimant, very close to the shoulder. In my opinion said amputation was very necessary for the reason that the bone was splintered, necrosed, and ulcerated. I believe that said operation was necessary in order to save the life of the patient. The condition of the bone was the result of a fracture of humerus at middle third while in the Army and Federal service. He had lost entire use of left arm and the continued pain, loss of sleep, and impairment of health made the amputation a necessity to save life."

It is true that in the first affidavit Dr. Hall describes the condition of the fractures of the fore-arm as well as the condition of the fractures of the humerus. It is true also that when the Pension Bureau, not satisfied as to the condition of the original injury to shoulder and fracture of humerus at the time of the amputation, called upon the claimant to furnish more evidence on that point, and he applied to Dr. Hall to explain more fully and exactly the condition of the old injury as he found it on amputation—it is true that Dr. Hall, responding to this call, in the second affidavit did describe it more fully and particularly. Then, because the second affidavit disagreed with the first, in that it was more explicit upon the points upon which more explicitness was demanded, it is declared to be in contradiction with the former affidavit, and on that account it is rejected.

Dr. Hall is a practicing physician of fifty-five years of age, at the head of the surgical department of Hahnemann Medical College and Hospital. He is a gentleman whose eminence in his profession ought to insure to his opinions great weight and his statements under oath to belief. Your committee find no contradiction in his testimony warranting the rejection of any part of it.

The other special reason assigned by the medical referee in the summation of his opinion before quoted is the alleged "statements of our examining surgeons that there was no necrosis or ulceration in the humerus and upper arm."

Your committee have carefully searched the record and have reviewed every statement made by the examining surgeons in this case from first to last and assert that in no instance, either directly or indirectly, do the examining surgeons state that there was "no necrosis or ulceration in the upper humerus and upper arm." They express no opinion whatever upon this particular phase of the disease. But Dr. W. W. Gill testified after repeated examinations of the arm, nearly four years prior to amputation, that in his opinion there was no necrosis of the bone.

The bone was not laid bare to view until Dr. Hall operated on and amputated the arm. Even if there was disagreement—and there is not—the testimony of Dr. Hall as to what he saw must outweigh all mere opinions formed by others from previous external examination.

Finally it is very pertinent to inquire if the arm was amputated because of a fracture between the elbow and wrist, why was it amputated close to the shoulder? The danger of the operation is increased with the near approach to the body.

No man willingly parts with more of the precious limb, when the ordeal of amputation must be endured, than surgical science demands. Lieutenant Nelson was reluctant to lose his arm, though it had been worse than useless, almost from the time of his discharge. When finally the risk of retaining it longer became too great he more was taken off than was deemed necessary to save his life. If it was cut off close to the body, it was solely because the disease of the bone which required amputation was close to the shoulder or at the point of original injury.

In brief the facts of this case are: That Thomas Nelson, a gallant private soldier, in the front rank of his company, charging a Confederate battery, fell within a few rods of the battery, shot three times through both legs.

That, while yet lame and scarcely able to walk, he was promoted lieutenant of the Forty-fifth Wisconsin Infantry, assigned to recruiting service, and while in the line of duty received a severe fall, dislocating his left shoulder and breaking the bone of his left arm twice near the shoulder.

That the arm was crippled and the bone diseased at the points of the original injury from that time, and continuously grew worse from year to year until the arm became "helpless from the shoulder down."

That because of lameness in leg from wounds and utter helplessness of the arm from said injury he suffered a fracture of the injured arm between the elbow and wrist subsequently.

That the arm finally was amputated because its condition, from the shoulder down, was such as to render amputation necessary to save the soldier's life.

That it was found necessary, because of the necrosed, ulcerated, splintered, and diseased condition of the bone of the upper arm, due to the injury of said arm in the service, to amputate it so close to the shoulder as to render it impossible for the claimant to wear an artificial arm.

Therefore, because the proofs and records in this case clearly sustain the foregoing, your committee unanimously recommend the passage of the bill allowing him a pension at the regular rate for loss of arm at the shoulder joint, instead of the pension he is now receiving.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

ASA JOINER.

On motion of Mr. TURNER, of Georgia, by unanimous consent, the House proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 10811) granting a pension to Asa Joiner.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Asa Joiner, of Mitchell County, Georgia, late a private in Captain Ball's company, Georgia Volunteers, also late a private in Captain Horn's company, Georgia Volunteers, in the Indian war of 1836, at the rate of $8 per month.

The report (by Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina) is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10811) granting a pension to Asa Joiner, have considered the same and report:

The claimant was a private in Capt. Greene B. Ball's company of the Seventy-seventh Regiment Georgia Militia, Indian war of 1836, and served from May 10, 1836, to June 16, 1836.

The testimony accompanying the bill shows clearly that the claimant is eighty-four years old, very feeble, and dependent entirely upon his manual labor for support, he having no other means of livelihood.

In view of the numerous precedents for the allowance of pensions to the aged and dependent survivors of the old Indian wars, your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

ALFRED A. JEROME.

On motion of Mr. BURTON, by unanimous consent, the House proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4013) granting an increase of pension to Alfred A. Jerome.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Alfred A. Jerome, late sergeant Company A, Twenty-third Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension of $67 per month, which shall be in lieu of his present pension from and after the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. YODER) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4013) granting an increase of pension to Alfred A. Jerome, submit the following report:

Alfred A. Jerome was a sergeant in Company A, Twenty-third Regiment Ohio Volunteers, and drew a pension at the rate of $8 a month from June 5, 1863, to April 3, 1884, since which time he has received $17 a month, for gunshot wound of face and resulting loss of left eye.

It appears from evidence on file that the ball struck the lower part of the orbit of the left eye, destroying the eye and crushing the orbit, and passing inward toward the left ear, destroyed the bones that formed the joint of the lower jaw, on the left side of the face, resulting in complete loss of motion in the jaws, there being no lateral motion, and only power to open the mouth one-fourth of an inch. He can not masticate food and must depend upon liquid food to sustain life, and consequently is a great sufferer from indigestion and from nausea, and is wholly unable to perform any kind of manual labor.

He applied at the Pension Office for increase, but his claim was rejected there for the reason that under the general law he could not be rated for the accumulative disabilities under which he suffers.

It also appears that his present pension is entirely inadequate to his disability and that the present pension laws do not provide for such a case as this.

In the opinion of this committee, this is a case that fully warrants granting relief to this soldier.

The committee therefore report favorably on the accompanying bill and ask that it do pass, amended, however, by striking out the word "sixty-seven" in line 3, and inserting the word "fifty."

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

AGNES M. BRADLEY.

On motion of Mr. GEISSENHAINER, by unanimous consent, the House proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6070) granting an increase of pension to Agnes M. Bradley.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay Agnes M. Bradley, widow of George W. Bradley, late a captain and assistant quartermaster United States Army, the sum of $50 per month, in lieu of the amount she is now receiving.

The report (by Mr. CRAIG) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6070) granting an increase of pension to Agnes M. Bradley, submit the following report: That Agnes M. Bradley is the widow of George W. Bradley, who was appointed captain and assistant quartermaster December 1, 1862. Served as lieutenant-colonel and assistant quartermaster from September 17, 1864, to November 6, 1864, and as colonel and quartermaster from November 7, 1864, to October 18, 1866, and accepted commission as captain and assistant quartermaster, United States Army, to date November 15, 1865.

In this rank he continued in the service, on duty, until his death, February 20, 1862. He served during the war as chief quartermaster, Tenth Corps, in the field, chief quartermaster, City Point, Va., chief quartermaster middle division department, and depot quartermaster Baltimore, Md. After the war, at various points: Fort Riley and Fort Harker, Kans., Fort Union, Tex., Charleston, S. C., Bismarck, Dak., St. Paul, Minn., Yuma Depot, Ariz., San Francisco, Cal., San Antonio, Tex., and Philadelphia. His widow was allowed a pension at $20 for his rank at time of his death.

The committee, in view of the long and faithful service of this officer, recommend the passage of the bill, amended to give her a pension according to the rank held by her husband during the war.

Amend by striking out "fifty" and inserting "thirty."

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

MRS. SUSAN A. DEAN.

On motion of Mr. CALDWELL, by unanimous consent, the House proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7375) granting a pension to Mrs. Susan A. Dean.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Susan A. Dean, widow of Mahlon C. Dean, late first lieutenant Company K, Twenty-eighth Iowa Volunteer Infantry, and to grant her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The report (by Mr. FLICK) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7375) granting a pension to Susan A. Dean, submit the following report:

The applicant is the widow of Mahlon C. Dean, who was a soldier of Company K, Twenty-eighth Iowa Infantry. In December, 1864, said soldier was sent home on furlough. In January, 1865, when returning to his regiment, he was severely frozen, from the effect of which he died in 1867. The widow applied for a pension, but the application was rejected on the ground that the soldier, being on furlough, was not in line of duty when injured. The ruling was sustained, on appeal, by the Secretary of the Interior, who makes this statement:

"It has been alleged and satisfactorily proven that the soldier while returning from his furlough had his ear frozen, and from said cause death ensued."

It will be observed that this widow would be entitled to a pension under the general law were it not for this technical ruling.

Your committee is of the opinion that in this case the soldier was obeying the implied orders of his furlough—returning to the front—and that his widow is entitled to a pension.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was read the third time.

SQUIRE WEST.

On motion of Mr. COOPER, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, the House proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 5106) for the relief of Squire West.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Squire West, late a private in Company F, Fourth Regiment of Indiana Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. PARRETT) is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5106) for the relief of Squire West, have considered the same and report:

The claimant was a private in Company F, Fourth Indiana Volunteers, and served over thirteen months in the war with Mexico. He filed an application for pension February 13, 1873, alleging that he incurred a rupture and also deafness during his service, but he was unable to furnish the proof required by the Pension Bureau and the claim was consequently disallowed.

Subsequently his name was placed on the pension-roll at $8 per month under the Mexican war service act of January 29, 1887. This sum now constitutes his sole income. He has no property, and by reason of age and an immense double rupture he is wholly incapacitated for any manual labor. He is about eighty-one years old.

Your committee believe that relief should be granted in this case, and the bill is reported back with the recommendation that it do pass with the following amendments: Change the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Squire West;" also amend by adding after the word "volunteers," in line 7, the words "and allow him a pension at the rate of $30 per month, the same to be in lieu of the amount now paid him."

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was read the third time.

JULIA W. FREEMAN.

On motion of Mr. CUTCHEON, by unanimous consent, the House proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 2420) granting a pension to Julia W. Freeman.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Julia W. Freeman, a resident of Marshall, Mich., at the rate of $25 per month, on account of disability resulting from disease contracted while serving as a hospital nurse during the war of the rebellion.

The report (by Mr. BELKNAP) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2420) granting a nurse's pension to Julia W. Freeman, submit the following report:

In September, 1862, Julia W. Freeman, leaving that her brother, a Union soldier, was dangerously wounded at Chantilly, left her home in Michigan and went to Alexandria, Va., to nurse him. She there became interested in the condition of the wounded Union soldiers, and from that time until July, 1865, devoted herself to their aid in hospital and in the field. Her labor was of the most efficient character. She was in the hospital, in camp, with the ambulances, wherever in fact a soldier needed nursing, food, clothing, or hospital attendance.

The wounded of Gettysburg and of the Wilderness, the sick and dying in field hospitals at Stevensburg and Brandy Station, were indebted to her for many comforts procured by her for them, and for assiduous care. During all the period mentioned she served in nearly every hospital connected with the Army of the Potomac. On the 6th day of July, 1864, in the midst of her labors, she was prostrated by typhoid fever. She was then at City Point, living in a tent and taking care of the sick and wounded. On the 2d of August she was removed to Washington. The fatigue of the journey brought on a relapse, and she was very ill for five weeks, and then went to Michigan to recruit her health. While there she collected money, provisions, and comforts for the soldiers, which she forwarded to Washington. After a few weeks at home recuperating, she returned to Washington and resumed her work for the sick and wounded, which ended in July, 1865.

This is only a partial sketch of this woman's services to her country. She performed these services without one cent of compensation.

She has never been healthy since she had typhoid fever, the result of exposure to the elements, of overwork, and of the fetid air of hospitals.

She was a brave woman, a patriot in the highest sense of the term. In accordance with their custom in cases where nurses are deserving and served without pay, the committee recommend the passage of the bill, amended, however, by striking out the words "twenty-five" in line 6 and inserting the word "twelve."

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was read the third time.

THOMAS W. HOUTS.

On motion of Mr. TARSNEY, by unanimous consent, the House proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 2963) for the relief of Thomas W. Houts.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to remit the unexecuted portion of the sentence of court-martial in the case of Thomas W. Houts, late major Seventh Cavalry Missouri State Militia, and to cause said Thomas W. Houts to be honorably mustered out of the volunteer service of the United States, as of the date of said sentence of said court-martial: Provided, That the said Thomas W. Houts shall not in consequence of the passage of this act be entitled to have or receive back pay or allowance.

The report (by Mr. KINSLEY) is as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill H. R. 2963, having considered the same, respectfully report:

At the beginning of the late war Thomas W. Houts was a prosperous young merchant in the town of Warrensburg, Johnson County, Missouri. Long before the firing upon Fort Sumter he had openly declared for the Union and announced his intention of seeking an early opportunity of entering the military service of the United States.

His father, then an old man, was a prominent and influential citizen of the county and was an unconditional Union man, as was also his older brother, William L. Houts, with whom Thomas W. Houts was then associated in business. The two brothers, at the risk of their lives, became very active in the Union cause, and were in constant communication with the Union leaders in that part of the State.

In May and June, 1861, when what was afterwards the Twenty-seventh Mounted Infantry Missouri Volunteers was recruited in that county, Thomas W. Houts was one of the first men to shoulder his musket and take his place in the ranks. On the 4th day of July, 1861, he was mustered into the service, for three years or during the war, as a private soldier in that regiment. He was soon afterwards promoted to quartermaster, and served in the field with his command in the army of the frontier until the early part of January, 1862. He then resigned and returned home, and re-enlisted at once as a private in Company A of the Seventh Cavalry Missouri State Militia, whose first battalion was then being recruited there by Maj. Emory S. Foster.

On the 11th day of January, 1862, Houts was promoted to the captaincy of his company. He took the field with it, drilled it up to a high state of efficiency, camped, marched, and fought in its front rank in the Southwest until the 18th day of February, 1863, when he was commissioned major of the second battalion of his regiment.

By that time he had made an enviable record as a true and faithful soldier and was much beloved by the men under his command.

He was a very gallant and dashing cavalry officer, always ready for any sort of desperate service, and distinguished among the many brave men with whom he served by extraordinary courage and coolness in action, as well as good judgment in the execution of difficult orders, great zeal for the cause, and unflinching loyalty to his friends.

Had a proper opportunity been afforded him he would have undoubtedly risen to a high rank in the service. As it was, he was justly regarded as one of the best officers of his grade in Missouri. He was, however, essentially a man of action, and therefore chafed under the restraint incident to garrison life and was not as well versed in military law as many other men who wholly lacked his fiery zeal and splendid courage in the field.

In the summer of 1864, Major Houts was stationed with his regiment at Warrensburg, Mo., then the headquarters of the central military district of Missouri. Then came the memorable campaign against Price in Missouri, in which Major Houts served with credit in the field at the head of his battalion.

Upon the return of the regiment to Warrensburg, in December, 1864, at the close of that campaign, its colonel (Phillips) was placed in command of that district, its lieutenant-colonel (Crittenden) was detailed to command that post, thus leaving Major Houts as the ranking officer of the regiment.

The provost-marshal then on duty at that post, Captain Ferguson, of the Seventh, reported directly to the provost-marshal-general, at department headquarters in St. Louis, but, as Major Houts had not been placed in command of his regiment by any formal orders, the orders detailing Captain Ferguson for duty as provost-marshal had not been communicated to him, and he was consequently not advised of their existence.

On the 13th day of December, 1864, William Higgins, then a private soldier in the Fifteenth Kansas Cavalry, now secretary of state of Kansas, arrived in Warrensburg in company with Major Houts's brother, Capt. William L. Houts, who then lived in Kansas.

They stopped with Major Houts's father, in Warrensburg, and of course frequently met Major Houts there.

Higgins had been regularly detailed for this trip by his commanding officer, who acted under the orders of General Blunt, then commanding the Department of Kansas, with headquarters at Fort Leavenworth.

The commanders of the Departments of Kansas and Missouri at that time did not co-operate in perfect harmony, and that feeling perhaps extended to some of their subordinate officers.

On the 17th of December, 1864, Captain Ferguson arrested Higgins as a suspicious character, and had him confined in the county jail, even after he was informed that Higgins was a soldier in a Kansas regiment, regularly detailed on detached service.

Major Houts was greatly incensed at this action, as he thought it was wholly unjustifiable, and besides construed it to be an indirect and malicious personal attack upon himself, his family, and personal friends.

On the next day, Colonels Phillips and Crittenden were both absent from the post, but no order had been issued designating their successors in command.

Without knowing the extent of Captain Ferguson's authority and acting on the mistaken impression that as the officer highest in rank then on duty at the post he had the right to assume the entire command, Major Houts ordered out a detail from his regiment, marched at the head of it to the jail, and then and there liberated Higgins from confinement, and returned him to his command at Paola, Kans., under an escort of citizens.

For this Major Houts was court-martialed and dismissed from the Army, on February 7, 1865, after nearly four years of arduous and gallant service in the field.

From that time until the present Major Houts has been a prominent, prosperous, and law-abiding farmer in Johnson County, Mo., where he still lives.

The War Department makes the following report on this case, viz:

The records show that Thomas W. Houts was mustered in as captain, Company A, Seventh Missouri State Militia Cavalry, March 8, 1862; as major April 4, 1863, and was dismissed the service by sentence of general court-martial, promulgated in General Orders, No. 34, from headquarters, Department of the Missouri, February 7, 1865, of which the following is a copy:

[General Orders No. 24]
HEADQUARTERS, DEPARTMENT OF THE MISSOURI,
St. Louis, Mo., February 7, 1865.

Before the general court-martial, which convened at St. Louis, Mo., pursuant to special orders No. 16, current series from these headquarters, and of which Brig. Gen. S. A. Meredith, United States Volunteers, is president, was arraigned and tried:

Maj. Thomas W. Houts, of the Seventh Regiment of Cavalry, Missouri State Militia, on the following charges and specifications:

Charge first: "Conduct to the prejudice of good order and military discipline." Specification: "In this, that he, Thomas W. Houts, major Seventh Regiment Missouri State Militia, did take a detachment of his regiment, and going to the guard-house of the post of Warrensburg, Mo., forcibly and unlawfully release a prisoner there confined named Higgins, an alleged deserter. This at Warrensburg, Mo., on or about December 18, 1864."

Charge second: "Disobedience of orders." Specification: "In this, that he, Thomas W. Houts, major Seventh Cavalry Regiment, Missouri State Militia, having been lawfully commanded by his superior officer to remain in camp with his regiment, did disobey that command and leave his camp and regiment. This at or near Warrensburg, Mo., on or about December 17, 1864."

Charge third: "Breach of arrest." Specification: "In this, that he, Thomas W. Houts, major Seventh Cavalry Regiment, Missouri State Militia, having duly been placed in arrest and confined in his quarters by his commanding officer, did leave his confinement before he was set at liberty by his commanding officer. This at or near Warrensburg, Mo., on or about the 18th day of December, 1864." This at or near Warrensburg, Mo., on or about the 18th day of December, 1864." To all of which charges and specifications the accused pleaded "not guilty."

FINDING.

The court, having maturely considered the evidence adduced, finds the accused as follows:

Of the specification, first charge, "guilty."
Of the first charge, "guilty."
Of the specification, second charge, "guilty, except the words 'and leave his camp and regiment.'"
Of the second charge, "guilty."
Of the specification, third charge, "guilty."
Of the third charge, "guilty."

SENTENCE.

And the court does therefore sentence him, Maj. Thomas W. Houts, Seventh Regiment of Cavalry, Missouri State Militia, "to be dismissed the service."

Finding and sentence confirmed. Maj. Thomas W. Houts, Seventh Regiment of Cavalry, Missouri State Militia, ceases to be an officer in the service of the United States from this date.

By command of Major-General Dodge.

J. W. BARNES,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

The proposed bill is drawn simply as an act of amnesty and is strictly in the line of existing precedents.

It involves the payment of no money from the Treasury of the United States and simply wipes out the disgrace attached to the name of a most deserving soldier, who has borne the burden of this stigma in silence for nearly twenty-three years.

In the judgment of your committee it is a proper exercise of the power of amnesty vested in Congress, and is amply sustained by previous legislation of a precisely similar character.

Your committee therefore recommends that the bill do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was read the third time.

G. L. PEASE.

On motion of Mr. DINGLEY, by unanimous consent, the House proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3498) granting a pension to G. L. Pease.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws (but at a rate not lower than $12 per month), the name of G. L. Pease, a survivor of the Black Hawk war.

The report (by Mr. DE LANO) is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3498) granting a pension to G. L. Pease, have examined the same and report:

This is a bill to pension Gideon L. Pease, a soldier of the Black Hawk war. From the report of the Adjutant-General, it appears that he enlisted in company K, First United States Infantry, January 23, 1829, and was discharged by expiration of term of service at Fort Armstrong, Ill., January 23, 1834.

The Adjutant-General's report closes by saying:

"He is reported as present for duty on all rolls of his company from April 23, 1830, to date of his discharge."

He served in Captain Harney's company. Abraham Lincoln and Jefferson Davis were in the same war, and Zachary Taylor was colonel in command.

Mr. Pease was born in 1806, and is therefore eighty-four years of age. He is now, by reason of his length of years and prostration caused by disease, confined to his bed, and this has been his condition since December, 1859, as shown by sworn testimony in the possession of the committee.

From the testimony of his physician, it is evident that he is a great sufferer, and that he requires the constant care of an attendant, and has required such constant care for more than a year.

It is furthermore a fact that he is very poor, and without any resources wherewith to obtain the most ordinary comforts for himself and his aged wife, except the contributions of neighbors, who know him and respect him, not only for his creditable military record, but for his exemplary and consistent life.

In view of his helpless condition, his suffering and poverty, the bill is reported with an amendment striking out the word "twelve" in line 6, and inserting "twenty-five."

As thus amended the bill is reported favorably with a recommendation that it do pass.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time.

ROBERT A. ENGLAND.

Mr. ROWLAND. I call up for the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEWART] the bill (H. R. 10263) granting a pension to Robert A. England.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Robert A. England, of De Kalb County, Georgia, who was a private soldier in Capt. John P. Lucas's company in the Creek Indian war of 1836, and allow him a pension at $20 per month.

The report (by Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina) is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10263) granting a pension to Robert A. England, have considered the same, and report as follows: The claimant was a private in Capt. John P. Lucas's company of Georgia Volunteers, and served one month and twelve days in the Creek Indian war of 1836.

It is shown by testimony filed in support of the bill that the claimant is seventy-three years old, and so much disabled by partial blindness and disease of kidneys and bladder that he can do nothing whereby to gain a livelihood. It is further shown that he has a daughter, totally helpless from imbecility, depending upon him for support, and he is in such a condition of destitution that he will soon have to depend upon charity or become a county charge.

In view of the facts stated your committee return the bill with a favorable recommendation.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

JOHN J. MURPHY.

Mr. ARNOLD. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9212) to relieve John J. Murphy from the discharge of desertion.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy of the United States be and he is hereby authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion now standing against John J. Murphy, late a seaman on the United States receiving-ship North Carolina, on the records and rolls of the Navy Department, and to grant and issue to said Murphy an honorable discharge from the said service.

The report (by Mr. DOLLIVER) is as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9212) to relieve John J. Murphy from the charge of desertion, have considered the same, and respectfully report:

The history of Murphy's naval service is given by the Navy Department, as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, June 21, 1890.

SIR: Referring to the bill (H. R. 9212) to relieve John J. Murphy from the charge of desertion, and the request of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives for information in the matter, I have the honor to state that it appears from an examination of the record of service of Murphy that he enlisted in the Navy July 14, 1862, as landsman for two years; that he served on board the United States steamer Ohio and Brooklyn until September 22, 1863, on which date he was transferred to the United States steamer North Carolina, and that opposite his name on the rolls of that vessel there was entered on the following day the memorandum "never appeared."

In view of the fact that Murphy failed to report on board the North Carolina after his transfer thereto, as stated, and it not appearing that he subsequently reported on board any naval vessel or at any naval station of the United States, he is regarded by the Department as having deserted the service on the date on which his name last appears on the rolls of the Brooklyn, namely, September 22, 1863.

Very respectfully,

F. M. RAMSAY,
Acting Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. C. A. BOUTWELL,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs, House of Representatives.

The bill (H. R. 9212) authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Navy to remove the charges of desertion now standing against John J. Murphy, late a seaman on the United States receiving-ship North Carolina, on the records and rolls of the Navy Department, and to grant and issue to said Murphy an honorable discharge from the said service.

The committee recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

T. J. NICHLESON.

Mr. HEARD. I desire to call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 5472) to remove the charge of desertion from T. J. Nicholson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of T. J. Nicholson, late private of Company F, Eighth Regiment Missouri State Militia Cavalry Volunteers, and to restore him to all the rights and privileges he would have been entitled to if said charge had never been entered against his name.

The report (by Mr. CAREY) is as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5472) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of T. J. Nicholson, having considered the same, respectfully report:

That Thomas J. Nicholson was enrolled as a private in Company F, Eighth Missouri State Cavalry Volunteers, February 22, 1862, to serve during the war in Missouri, and was mustered out with his company March 31, 1865. The soldier's record during his entire service of more than three years was good, except an absence without leave for one month and five days, from October 27, to December 2, 1862, for which he was tried and paid the penalty of conviction. When this soldier enlisted he was but fifteen years old. It is evident he did not intend to desert, as he voluntarily returned to his company. He simply went home, as he says, to see his sick father, and returned as soon as it was safe to leave him. A copy of this soldier's military record is herewith presented and made a part hereof.

The committee recommend that the bill do pass.

RECORD AND PENSION DIVISION, April 23, 1890.

Thomas J. Nicholson, private Company F, Eighth Missouri State Militia Cavalry Volunteers, was enrolled on February 22, 1862, to serve during the war in Missouri. He was mustered out with the company on March 31, 1865. His record appears to have been very good, with the following exception:

He was arraigned before a general court-martial on the charge of desertion, specifying that on or about October 27, 1862, he deserted his company and regiment and remained absent until December 2, 1862, at which time he reported for duty. He was found guilty, and was sentenced to forfeit to the use of the General Government one month of his pay proper and be publicly reprimanded by the commanding officer of the battalion. The proceedings, findings, and sentence of the court were duly approved and ordered to be carried into effect, and were promulgated in General Orders, No. 63, dated at headquarters of the district of Southwest Missouri, July 31, 1864.

In connection with his application for removal of the charge of desertion, under date of June 30, 1873, this man stated that at the time when he absented himself from his command without proper authority he was but fifteen years of age; his father, who served in the company with him, was at that time sick at home, and as hundreds of soldiers were then in the habit of going home without leave, he left his company on October 27, 1862, at Osage Springs, Ark., without intending to desert, went home, and voluntarily rejoined his command on December 2, 1862, at Marshfield, Mo.

On February 4, 1890, Hon. John A. Logan, United States Senator, was informed, in reply to his inquiry as to the status of this case, that this soldier having been tried and convicted of desertion by a general court-martial and the sentence of the court having received the approval of the reviewing authority, such action is held to be a final closing of the case, and there is no provision of law under which the Department can reopen the case for consideration; and there appears to be no relief for this applicant except in additional legislation by Congress.

Since 1890 the status of the case has not been changed by subsequent legislation. Respectfully submitted.

F. C. AINSWORTH,
Captain and Assistant Surgeon, U. S. Army.

THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

RANSOM E. BRAMAN.

Mr. WICKHAM. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9666) granting an increase of pension to Ransom E. Braman.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Ransom E. Braman, late a member of Company I, Eighth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, at the rate of $50 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The report (by Mr. YODER) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9666) granting an increase of pension to Ransom E. Braman, submit the following report:

The undisputed testimony of four reputable physicians and surgeons shows that Ransom E. Braman, who was a member of Company I, Eighth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, was wounded at North Anna River, Virginia, May 24, 1864, by a minié-ball, which entered the upper part of the front of the left thigh, passing just inside of the bone and emerging on the back and outer part of the thigh, injuring and impairing the function of the nerves, vessels, and muscles of the leg so as to cause a chronic gangrenous condition of the great toe, complete loss of sensation of the entire foot and part of the leg, and inability to extend the foot upon the ankle or to flex or extend the leg upon the thigh.

That the leg, in consequence of the inability to use it, has shrunk so that it measures 1 inch more than the right, owing to chronic inflammatory exudation. That the injury to the vessels and nerves is so near the hip-joint that any amputation of the leg or thigh would be inadvisable, an opinion concurred in by some of Ohio's most eminent surgeons. That for the last ten years he has had yearly attacks of acute inflammation of the foot and ankle that have confined him to his bed from two weeks to two months at a time, and that every few weeks he has had similar but lighter attacks. That he is not able to perform any manual labor. That his condition is immeasurably worse than if the leg was amputated and an artificial limb adjusted. That an artificial limb would be vastly more serviceable to him than his wounded leg; that a good artificial limb is worth ten of his, for with it, besides being able to travel and be on his feet several times more than at present, he would be free from the daily recurring pain, swelling, and discharge which now afflicts him and will soon cause his death.

In addition to the foregoing, his wife describes his condition as follows:

"My husband is suffering from a gunshot wound of the left thigh, which affects his whole leg and foot so that at times he can scarcely walk, and every little while he is laid up so that he can not stop, and we fear every time he is taken down that he may die. Each year he gets more disabled, and the least attempt he makes to work lays him up for days, and then his suffering is intense. His foot swells up, and the big toe and down to the ball of the foot looks like a sponge full of holes, and filled up with bloody pus, which discharges nearly all the time. Physicians tell us the bones are decaying. Sometimes it gets almost black, and we fear blood-poisoning or gangrene."

The committee feel that the soldier is entitled to a greater pension than he would be if he had lost his limb. They therefore recommend that the bill do pass, amended as follows: In line 7 strike out "fifty" and insert "forty-five."

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

CHARLES T. SLOAT.

Mr. LANE. I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 10602) granting a pension to Charles T. Sloat.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charles T. Sloat, late of Company B, One hundred and eighth Regiment of Illinois Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. LANE) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10602) granting a pension to Charles T. Sloat, submit the following report:

The soldier enlisted August 15, 1862, and was honorably discharged August 5, 1865. The basis of the claim is that at Spanish Fort, Ala., March 26, 1865, the veins of the soldier's left leg below the knee were burst, and has gradually grown worse until now he is very badly afflicted with varicose veins and has running sores. The claim was rejected in the Pension Office on the ground that there was no record or other evidence showing origin of injury in the service and claimant's inability to furnish any such evidence.

The soldier testifies to the incurrence of the injury in the service and in line of duty, and that it has gradually grown worse until now he has running sores on his leg and is compelled to use zinc plates to support his said leg, and was treated in regimental hospital, but the surgeon is now dead. William Franks, the lieutenant of his company, testifies that the soldier was sound when he entered the service. John B. Lederman and Henry L. Coggins, comrades of the soldier, testify to prior soundness. Jones F. Peyton testifies to same fact. Thompson Sloat, father of the soldier, testifies that when he entered the Army the soldier was sound and healthy, and when he returned from the Army he had varicose veins and that he has been treated for said disease ever since. Several other witnesses testify that when the soldier returned from the Army he was afflicted with varicose veins and is so afflicted ever since. The board of examining surgeons find that said soldier is entitled to twelve-eighths rating for varicose veins.

The committee think that they are warranted in the conclusion that the soldier sustained injuries while in the service and became diseased in line of duty and has continued diseased ever since.

We report the bill back with a recommendation that said bill do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

CLARRISSA BARKER.

Mr. KNAPP. I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 6195) granting a pension to Clarrissa Barker.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions of the pension laws, the name of Clarrissa Barker, widow (aged 96) of William P. Barker, late a private in Company E, Sixth Regiment New York Heavy Artillery Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6195) granting a pension to Clarissa Barker, submitted the following report:

The evidence shows that Clarissa Barker is a widow of William P. Barker; that William P. Barker enlisted as a private in Company B, Sixth New York Heavy Artillery, February 8, 1864, and was discharged August 24, 1865; that he applied for an invalid pension January 13, 1869, for the reason "that while in service and in line of duty as a soldier on or about May 12, 1864, in action at Spottsylvania Court-House, Va., he received a gunshot wound in the left leg above the knee, causing lameness; that on the 13th day of September, 1864, while going through Shenandoah Valley, he was struck in the big toe of the right foot by some missile unknown, severing the first joint of said toe; that since his discharge he has been unable to perform steady labor."

At the time of making this application he was about sixty years of age.

After making application in 1869 soldier disappeared and has not been heard of since. The widow alleges that he left home soon after the war, and that she has never heard from him since 1869, at which time he was in Philadelphia in a dying condition, the result, as she believes, of his army experience, and that she is unable to procure further testimony.

The claim of the widow for pension was rejected for want of proof of the date and cause of soldier's death.

Clarissa Barker is now about ninety years of age and dependent on the charity of her relatives for support.

The committee recommend the passage of the bill, amending line 6 by striking out the words "aged ninety-six."

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

SAMUEL S. HUMPHREYS.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 10810) granting a pension to Samuel S. Humphreys.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Samuel S. Humphreys, of Mitchell County, Georgia, late a private in Captain Abner Williams's company, Georgia Volunteers, in the Indian war of 1835 and 1836, at the rate of $3 per month.

The report (by Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina) is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10810) granting a pension to Samuel S. Humphreys, beg leave to submit the following report: The claimant was a private in Capt. Abner Williams's company, Georgia Volunteers, and served three months and sixteen days in the Florida Indian war of 1835-36.

He asks a pension by special act at the rate of $3 per month, declaring under oath that he is seventy-two years old and without any means of support whatever except manual labor, and he is now physically unable to do any work by which to gain a livelihood for himself and wife.

Mr. W. S. Spence, attorney of Camilla, Ga., states that the claimant has a hard time to make a living and is very poor.

In view of the claimant's service and his great age and dependence, your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker, there are a couple of bills here that gentlemen—one on each side—want to call up. I want to call up one and the gentleman from North Dakota, on the other side, Mr. HANSBROUGH, wants to call up one, and I would like to have unanimous consent to do so.

There was no objection.

JOHN E. WALTON.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask that the bill (S. 2076) granting an increase of pension to John E. Walton, which has previously been reported from the Committee of the Whole House, be read the third time and passed.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

W. H. OBRIEN.

Mr. KILGORE. I ask that the bill (H. R. 5145) granting a pension to W. H. O'Brien, which has been reported from the Committee of the Whole and read the third time, be passed.

The bill was passed.

CATHERINE S. LAWRENCE.

Mr. FLOWER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up for Mr. TRACEY, who is not able to be present, the bill (H. R. 8234) granting a pension to Catherine S. Lawrence.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Catherine S. Lawrence, and pay her a pension as an army nurse of $25 per month during life, to date from March 4, 1867.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8234) granting a pension to Catherine S. Lawrence, submit the following report:

The evidence shows that the beneficiary had by training, before she received her appointment as nurse, qualified herself for that position; that she entered the service as a nurse in 1861 and continued in the same for four years.

She was first assigned to duty at Fortress Monroe, where she remained for some time. Then she was appointed by General H. Finley director of the Kalorama Eruptive Hospital, where she remained nearly a year caring for patients sick with the small-pox and other loathsome diseases. She remained here until separation from the outside world and the nature of her service affected her health, when she was removed by order of Dr. Bulkley to the Patent Office Hospital. She remained here several months, when the medical director appointed her to Seventh Street Military Hospital. This was a very filthy place, the sick lying on their army blankets upon the floor. She had the men carried out under the trees, the rooms thoroughly cleaned, and cots and bedding procured, and the men made comfortable.

She then went to Armory Square Hospital. Here she worked, putting everything in readiness for patients. This was previous to the second battle of Bull Run. Here she remained several months, acting as surgical nurse. She then went to Convalescent Camp, near Alexandria, caring for the sick and assisting in preparing food for sixty convalescent soldiers. She also served in the hospital at Fairfax.

During these years of service she received no compensation. She raised by her own efforts large amounts of supplies, visiting New England in person to procure supplies for the soldiers, which she distributed in person. She is now over seventy years of age, in very feeble health, is entirely without means of support, and supported by her friends. She is a maiden lady, old, feeble, dependent. She gave four of the best years of her life for the benefit of the sick and wounded soldiers, caring for them when sick with that loathsome disease the small-pox, and now broken down in health she asks the Government, for which she has labored so faithfully, to grant her a sum that shall place her above want.

She is warmly recommended by the Army Nurses Association, by ladies of the Sanitary Commission, and by many of the most prominent citizens of the city of Albany, N. Y., her home.

Your committee think her case is an exceptional one, richly deserving the ann named in the bill. To be amended by striking out the word "twenty-five," in line 7, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "sixteen."

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I object to that bill as it is because it carries arrears; and I move to strike out the word "sixteen" and insert "twelve," and also strike out all after the word "month" to the end of the bill.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. MORRILL moved that the several votes by which the various bills had been passed be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour of 10.30 having arrived the House stands adjourned until 11 o'clock to-morrow under the order of the House.

JAMES CALER.

The bill (S. 3006) for the relief of James Caler was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to James Caler, of Stanford, Conn., $7,245 for work done by him under a contract with the United States in the dredging and excavation of the bar at Rutherford Park, in the Passaic River, New Jersey.

Mr. BUTLER. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is.

Mr. BUTLER. Let it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. FAULKNER May 7, 1890:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3006) for the relief of James Caler, have had the same under consideration and beg leave to report:

Your committee adopt the report made by the Committee on Claims of the Senate during the second session of the Fiftyeth Congress, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The report is as follows: "That the facts set forth in House Report 481 are fully sustained by the record and is adopted as the report of this committee."

"The House report is as follows: "That on the 25th day of June, 1873, the petitioner entered into a contract with the United States of America for dredging and excavating the bar at Rutherford Park, in the Passaic River, New Jersey. For this work he was to receive, when it was completed, the sum of $14,500. The work has been completed according to the requirements of the contract. In the specifications which were made part of the contract the material was represented as consisting 'of loose stone, bowlders, sand, and gravel.' After quite a large part of the work had been done it was discovered that the remaining portion of the material to be removed consisted in part of a hard blue clay and hardpan, the removal of which was attended with an expense much greater than would have attended the removal of such material as the contract specified. For this extra expense Mr. Caler claims compensation.

"Lieut. Col. John Newton, who is engineer in charge of the work, and who represented the United States in making said contract, and executed it for them, admits that there was a mistake made in the description in the contract of the character of the material to be removed and that the claimant is entitled to some relief; and your committee are of that opinion. The question as to the amount that should be allowed him in full compensation is one of some difficulty. In a communication addressed to your committee, dated May 1, 1878, he says: 'In arriving at a conclusion as to the extent of Mr. Caler's claim against the Government, there must be some uncertainty in spite of all the care that can be taken. As to the fact that he has some claim there can be no dispute, because the materials—sand, gravel, broken stone, and bowlders—which he contracted to remove were underlaid in some parts by a hard clay very difficult to dredge and which was not specified in the contract.'

"Colonel Newton has made, at the request of your committee, two computations of the amount to be paid to the claimant in full satisfaction. The first is upon a basis of payment for the use of his dredge and scows used, and of the wages of the men required to handle them, with the other expenses incident to their use. Upon this basis he finds the amount to be paid to the claimant to be $11,709. Subsequently Colonel Newton submitted another estimate, based upon payment to the claimant for the ordinary wear and repair of machinery, wages of the men employed, with interest upon the value of the dredge, scows, and other material used in the prosecution of the work, to which he adds $1,000 for the services of the claimant. Upon this basis he makes the amount to be paid $7,245.

"Your committee, under these circumstances, would recommend the payment of the lowest sum found due by Lieut. Col. John Newton, the engineer in charge, to wit, $7,245, and, as the bill only asks for that amount, would recommend that the same do pass."

Mr. INGALLS. It does not appear that there is any recommendation from the Secretary of War, who is the head of the Department to which the engineer was responsible. It appears to me that the evidence is insufficient to justify Congress in allowing so large an amount in excess of a contract which was entered into with that officer. I suggest that the case go over for further consideration.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I hope not. This case has already once passed the Senate, and I think twice, reported, if I remember, by Senator Palmer, of Michigan. At any rate, I know that he was very much interested in it, and that the case was discussed here in the Senate, and on full discussion was passed, and I have an impression that at that time there was a letter from the Secretary of War. At any rate, this recommendation by General Newton would seem to cover the whole ground, and, as only the smallest amount which he has recommended is adopted here and as the Senate has once acted upon it, I should hope that there would be no further delay. My recollection about it is that the bill was also passed in the other House, but so late as to fail to receive the approval of the President. I trust the Senator from Kansas will not insist upon his objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas withdraw his objection?

Mr. INGALLS. The fact that a bill on the Private Calendar on Saturday has passed the Senate does not constitute even a prima facie case in its favor. Everybody understands that. It is not entitled to be quoted as a precedent. Therefore the statement of the Senator from Connecticut has no effect, and that shows the disadvantage of doing business in the way that we are in the habit of doing when the Calendar is under consideration under Rule VIII.

I repeat that there is no foundation, in my judgment, so far as this report is concerned, for the passage of this bill. If, as the Senator states, there is a report from the Secretary of War, and that is made to appear, recommending it, I shall withdraw my objection. Otherwise I shall insist upon it.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator, of course, has a right to object and send the bill over. When this bill was considered in the last Congress we were not operating under the Saturday five-minute rule as we are now, and this bill had a very careful consideration by the Committee on Claims in that Congress, as it has had at this session. It was examined carefully by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER], who is a very careful member of the committee, and his report was discussed by the entire committee.

The bill was sent, as I recollect, according to the rule of the committee, to the War Department; but we are not limited in passing such bills by the recommendations of the head of a Department. I suppose the Secretary of War would have referred the bill to the Engineer Department, and his recommendation, if he made any, would have been in accordance with the recommendation of the Engineer Department.

The committee had before it the letter of General Newton, who is a very competent and very careful man, and the facts, as he states them, notwithstanding the remarks of the Senator from Kansas, seemed to the committee, and I think would seem to the Senate, to create a very strong equity in favor of this claimant.

I do not care to discuss the bill, as the Senator has the power to stop it. I hope it may go over without prejudice, however, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

ISRAEL KIMBALL.

Mr. BLAIR. I suggested awhile ago that Order of Business 1149, being the bill (S. 3753) for the relief of Israel Kimball, should be passed over without prejudice. I find that I was misinformed in regard to it, and I withdraw the objection.

ENSIGN J. B. BERNADOU.

Mr. PAYNE. I inquire what was done with Order of Business 1148, being the joint resolution (S. R. 80) authorizing Ensign J. B. Bernadou, United States Navy, to accept two vases presented to him by the Government of Japan. A similar measure from the House of Representatives came here and was passed a few days ago and returned to that body. This joint resolution should be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order has been made.

SURETIES OF OZIAS MORGAN.

The bill (S. 383) for the relief of Daniel C. Rodman and others, sureties on the bond of Ozias Morgan, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to release Daniel C. Rodman, Ossian B. Hart, Charles Slazer, Calvin L. Robinson, Ozias Buddington, and Joseph R. Richard, sureties upon the bond of Ozias Morgan, given as security for the faithful performance by Morgan of his duties as receiver of public moneys and disbursing agent of the United States land office at Tallahassee, Fla., from 1866 to 1870.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the report be read in that case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

Mr. HAWLEY. Perhaps I can shorten it a little if the Senator will accept my statement. I have been at work in the committee on that case for many years. Rodman was an officer in my regiment and I am entirely familiar with the facts. He was a very excellent citizen and settled in Florida for a number of years. He was induced to go upon the bond of a receiver of public moneys and also was unfortunate in business there. He became afflicted with disease. After his return to Connecticut he died; about twelve or fourteen years afterwards his family was informed that the receiver was behind in his accounts.

Mr. INGALLS. How much?

Mr. HAWLEY. About $2,000. The report states exactly the amount, but that is approximately the sum. The Government collected something of some of the other gentlemen who were good at the time. The other sureties were sued separately and they either compromised their claims, became insolvent, absconded, or have died.

Now Rodman is in his grave, owing to wounds he received whilst serving the Government. The Government has served process against the widow, and all she has is a house worth about $2,400, which they were able to save out of his salary as pension agent. We propose to relieve the widow from the danger of losing her house. The Government was twelve or fourteen years—I am stating it moderately—after this default occurred, before it called upon the widow, and then it was after the husband was dead.

Mr. INGALLS. That is a satisfactory and convincing statement so far as Rodman is concerned, but there are five other sureties who are also on the same bond who are proposed to be relieved by the same bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not care anything about them; I do not know anything about them, but I doubt if they have any money or if the Government can get anything out of them. The Government compromised with some of them and got but a few dollars.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas desire the reading of the report?

Mr. INGALLS. I do not.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CALIFORNIA SCHOOL LANDS.

The bill (S. 2726) to enable the State of California to take lands in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections found to be mineral lands was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The Committee on Claims reported an amendment, after the word "months," in line 9, to insert "from the passage of this act;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time for filing claims in the Court of Claims under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide for the ascertainment of claims of American citizens for spoiliations committed by the French prior to the 31st day of July, 1801," approved January 20, 1855, be, and the same is hereby, extended for an additional period of twelve months from the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

ABANDONED MILITARY RESERVATIONS IN WYOMING.

The bill (H. R. 8245) to provide for the disposal of the abandoned military reservations in Wyoming Territory was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments, in line 5, before the word "Sanders," to strike out "Larrimio" and insert "Laramie;" in line 6, after the word "reservations," to strike out "and the Fort Fetterman hay reservation;" in line 14, after the word "entry," to insert "not exceeding one quarter-section;" and in line 24, after the word "subdivision," to strike out "of land shall contain at least" and insert "may include adjoining lands to the amount of;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That all public lands now remaining undisposed of within the abandoned military reservations in the Territory of Wyoming, known as Fort Fetterman (post), Laramie, Sanders, and Steele (post), military reservations, and that portion of the Fort Bridger reservation heretofore abandoned for military purposes, and which are not otherwise occupied or used for any public purpose, are hereby made subject to disposal under the homestead law only: Provided, That actual occupants thereon upon the 1st day of January, 1890, if otherwise qualified, shall have the preference right to make one entry not exceeding one quarter-section under either of the existing land laws, which shall include their respective improvements: Provided further, That any of such lands as are occupied for town-site purposes, and any of the lands that may be shown to be valuable for coal or minerals, such lands so occupied for town-site purposes or valuable for coal or minerals, shall be disposed of as now provided for lands subject to entry and sale under the town-site, coal, or mineral land laws, respectively: Provided further, That this act shall not apply to any subdivision of land, which subdivision may include adjoining lands to the amount of 160 acres, on which any buildings or improvements of the United States are situated until the Secretary of the Interior shall so direct: Provided further, That the passage of this act shall not be construed to amend or repeal the act approved May 23, 1888, entitled "An act granting certain lands in the Territory of Wyoming for public purposes."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read "A bill to provide for the disposal of certain abandoned reservations in Wyoming Territory."

GEORGE M. WHEELER.

The bill (S. 1689) for the relief of George M. Wheeler was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 7, after the words "from the" to strike out "30th of June" and insert "23d of July;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice of the Senate, to appoint Capt. George M. Wheeler, United States Army, retired, a major on the retired-list of the Army, with the rank and pay of that grade from the 23d of July, 1888, being the date on which he would have been eligible to promotion but for his retirement as captain on June 15, 1888.

MR. REAGAN. I ask for the reading of the report in that case.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. HAMPTON May 8, 1890:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1689) for the relief of George M. Wheeler, beg leave to report the same back to the Senate amended, with recommendation that it should be passed as reported.

The case of Captain Wheeler is one of exceptional merit, and the committee have been brought to a favorable consideration of it by the following facts: Captain Wheeler, who was the senior captain in the Engineer Corps, was retired a few days before he would have been entitled to promotion. His record is a brilliant one, and though he had been retired he devoted himself to the completion of the important work in which he had been engaged previous to his retirement. A letter from Captain Wheeler to General Casey showing this fact is submitted as part of this report, as is also an extract from the official record of this officer given by the Department of War.

The committee also submit letters from the honorable Secretary of War, the Major-General Commanding, and the Chief of Engineers, warmly commending the services of Captain Wheeler and advocating the relief proposed in the bill reported.

The bill is amended by striking out the words "thirtieth of June," in line 7, and inserting in lieu thereof "twenty-third of July."

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 1, 1890.

SIR: I have the honor respectfully to state that the duty to which I was specially assigned by authority of the honorable the Secretary of War, commencing March 1, 1889, it was only possible to terminate on December 30, 1889, when the work on volumes I, Geographical Surveys, was substantially completed. Nevertheless, pursuant to the policy of the War Department, I was retired from active service on June 15, 1888, by the approval of the physical-incapacity finding of a retiring board of June, 1888, although on that day it was expected that a vacancy in the rank of major of the Corps of Engineers would exist on June 30, 1888, to which I asked to be promoted, and to which promotion I would have had a legal claim, as soon as the aforesaid vacancy should have existed, had not the retirement been made prior thereto, which vacancy, it appears, actually occurred July 23, 1888.

Therefore, in closing my record before the Department, it may be remarked that since the action of the retiring board, in 1888, I have voluntarily performed, at the instance of the Engineer Department, regardless of my condition of health, duty which has resulted in completing, as far as possible, the general and professional records of the late office of Geographical Surveys and in the publication of a number of topographic and land-classification maps and the following printed volumes: Volume I, Geographical Report, 4^o, 780 pages, 33 plates and 3 maps; Report on Venice Congress, 570 pages, 11 plates and maps; and Report on Geographic Positions, etc., royal 8^o, 261 pages.

I have the honor to request that, so far as practicable, the above facts shall appear of record in connection with the relief contemplated in S. 1689 [H. R. 4300] Fifty-first Congress, first session, together with the further fact that the field duty upon which I was engaged, and to which the physical disability was incident, was performed under conditions of much hardship, deprivation, and exposure, in a region of mountain and desert, substantially uninhabited.

Most respectfully yours,

GEO. M. WHEELER,
Captain, etc.

Brig. Gen. THOS. LINCOLN CASEY,
Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

[Extract from official record.]

Since his retirement, Captain Wheeler has voluntarily performed, at the instance of the Engineer Department, regardless of his condition of health, duty which has resulted in completing, as far as possible, the general and professional records of the late office of Geographical Surveys and in the publication of a number of topographic and land-classification maps, and the following printed volumes: Volume I, Geographical Report, 4^o, 780 pages, 33 plates, and 3 maps; Report on Venice Congress, 570 pages, 11 plates and maps; and Report on Geographic Positions, etc., royal 8^o, 261 pages.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, May 3, 1890.

SIR: In connection with my letter to you of February 20, last, on Senate bill 1689, for the relief of Capt. George M. Wheeler, Corps of Engineers, I now have the honor to advise you that at the request of that officer I referred the inclosed copies of S. 1689 and H. R. 4300 to the Chief of Engineers and the major-general commanding the Army for remarks, and I invite attention to the inclosed reports of those officers, dated the 1st instant, thereon.

In view of the strong recommendations of Generals Casey and Schofield, I recommend relief as proposed in the bill.

Very respectfully,

REDFIELD PROCTOR,
Secretary of War.

Hon. J. R. HAWLEY,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs, United States Senate.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., May 1, 1890.

SIR: In reference to Senate bill 1689, Fifty-first Congress, first session, for the relief of George M. Wheeler, I have the honor to remark that Captain Wheeler, as an officer of engineers, performed very arduous service for many years, involving such exposure and hardship as resulted in his permanent disability. On this account he was retired from active service on the eve of his promotion to the grade of major, and was thus deprived of the promotion which his services had so well merited. I am also informed that Captain Wheeler performed much valuable service after his retirement, in the completion or transfer to others of the work upon which he had been employed. His case seems, therefore, especially deserving of relief.

I beg leave to suggest that, while physical disability is a necessary disqualification for appointment to office or for continuance in active military service, either in the same or in a higher grade, regular promotion is the one and only reward offered to an officer of the Army for faithful service; and hence that an officer should not, in justice, be deprived of that promotion solely because he is found incapacitated at the time when that promotion is due him under the law. It would seem more consonant with strict justice to give the officer the reward which his services have earned and then place him on the retired-list.

Very respectfully,

J. M. SCHOFIELD,
Major-General Commanding.

THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS, UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, D. C., May 1, 1890.

SIR: I have the honor to return bill H. R. 4300, referred to me for remark, and to accompany this communication with a statement of the services of Captain Wheeler. I also inclose a copy of a communication from Gen. J. C. Duane, Chief of Engineers, dated May 23, 1888, which relates to circumstances preceding, and attendant upon his retirement from active service so far as known to this department.

Captain Wheeler's services in the Corps of Engineers, while he was able to take the field, were remarkably brilliant and in the line of duty with which he was charged have not been exceeded by any officer of his rank. His surveys west of the one hundredth meridian, the last volume of which has just been published under his supervision, has become a standard and model, and is constantly referred to and accepted by the various interests involved. In my judgment this service alone would entitle him to marked consideration and to the measure of relief contained in the bill H. R. 4300.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOS. LINCOLN CASEY,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Engineers.

Hon. REDFIELD PROCTOR,
Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, February 19, 1890.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith a bill (S. 1689) for the relief of George M. Wheeler, now captain, United States Army, retired, which was referred to the War Department on the 15th instant by the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, together with statement of the military services of that officer.

The bill proposes to authorize the promotion of Captain Wheeler to the grade of major on the retired-list with rank and pay from June 30, 1888, the date when it is claimed he would have been eligible for promotion had he not been retired, etc.

On May 29, 1883, Captain Wheeler requested that he be examined by an Army retiring board with a view to determining his fitness or unfitness for active service, and an order was issued accordingly on June 14, 1883, directing him to appear before the board at Governor's Island, New York, of which Maj. Gen. W. S. Hancock was president. He reported as directed, and was examined June 18, 1883, and the board reported as its finding that he was "incapacitated for active service in consequence of repeated abscesses of the liver resulting in loss of substance of that organ, adhesions of the digestive functions, and frequent attacks of dysentery, all contracted in the line of duty."

Notwithstanding the finding of the board, Captain Wheeler was on duty after his examination, namely, from October 1, 1883, to March 6, 1884; March 1, 1885, to November 19, 1887; and May 18, 1888, to date of retirement, June 15, 1888; but a number of other officers similarly situated have performed light duty between the date of examination and the date of retirement, and in that respect the case is not exceptional.

Captain Wheeler became the senior captain in the Corps of Engineers April 7, 1888, and, in pursuance of the policy of the President at that time, he was retired from active service before the occurrence of a vacancy in the grade of major to which he could lay claim to promotion. The next vacancy in the higher grade did not occur until July 23, 1888 (the date of death of Lieut. Col. Walter McFarland), and if he had remained in service and been considered eligible for promotion he could not have been promoted June 30, 1888, the date fixed in the bill.

A vacancy occurred June 30, 1888, in the office of Chief of Engineers, but the colonel in the Corps of Engineers who was appointed to that vacancy did not accept the appointment nor enter into possession of the office until July 23, 1888, and the resulting vacancies to be filled by promotion did not exist prior to that date.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. C. KELTON, Adjutant-General.

THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, February 19, 1890.

Statement of the military service of George M. Wheeler, of the United States Army, compiled from the records of this office.

He was graduated at the United States Military Academy and appointed second lieutenant of engineers June 18, 1866, promoted first lieutenant March 7, 1867, and captain March 4, 1879.

He served as assistant engineer at San Francisco, Cal., from October 20, 1866, to September 4, 1868; as engineer officer on the staff of the commanding general Department of California (on field service, June 12, to November 29, 1870) to February 9, 1871; and in charge of surveys and explorations in Arizona and Nevada (west of the one hundredth meridian) to June 17, 1880; on ordinary leave to September 30, 1880, and on sick leave to April 1, 1881; on detached duty as commissioner to the International Geographical Congress at Venice, Italy, and engaged in the preparation of his report thereof to December 31, 1882; in charge of the geographical surveys west of the one hundredth meridian, and in addition thereto engaged in finishing his report of service as commissioner to the International Geographical Congress, to June 18, 1883, when examined by a retiring board and found incapacitated for active service; on leave to October 1, 1883; in charge of geographical surveys west of the one hundredth meridian to March 6, 1884; on sick leave to March 1, 1885; on temporary duty superintending publications pertaining to geographical surveys to November 19, 1887; on sick leave to May 18, 1889; on duty in connection with geographical surveys to June 15, 1888, when retired for disability in line of his duty.

J. C. KELTON, Adjutant-General.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not object to the consideration of the bill, but I want to vote against it because it is one of those things that I think ought not to be done.

Mr. HAWLEY. What did the Senator ask?

Mr. REAGAN. I said I should not object to the consideration of the bill, but that I should vote against it.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not expect to debate the question, but I wish to say that the bill was very carefully considered in the committee; but the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON] who reported it is not here. Wheeler is an officer of very distinguished record, and just by a few days missed a promotion which he had earned ten times over by his services to the Government. It is a hard case, and the committee sympathize entirely with him.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HENRY ZELL.

The bill (S. 2095) to place Henry Zell on the retired-list of the Army was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, to strike out lines 19 to 49, both inclusive, as follows:

He having enlisted in said company and regiment February 12, 1847, and served therein under successive enlistments until December 29, 1852; in the Veteran Reserve Corps from September 3, 1863, to August 29, 1866; in the United States Army from October 4, 1866, to March 27, 1869, and again in Company C, Twentieth United States Infantry, from April 1, 1869, to April 1, 1879, and during these terms of service the said Henry Zell participated in these battles, to wit: During the Mexican war, in the battles at Contreras, Churubusco, Chapultepec, and entered the city of Mexico, with the army of occupation under General Winfield Scott. Afterwards took part in battle against the Apache, Ute, and Plute Indians in the years 1854 and 1856, with his command; also against the Navajo and other Indian tribes in 1859 and 1860. During the late war he served with said Company C, Third United States Infantry, and participated in these battles, namely, First Bull Run, Yorktown, Williamsburgh, Fair Oaks, Malvern Hill, Gaines's Mills, Mechanicsville, and in 1864 participated in resisting Early's attack on the city of Washington, at which time he was in the Veteran Reserve Corps, and being now an honorably discharged soldier, and having performed more than thirty-one years' service up to the time of his last discharge, namely, April 1, 1879.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to place Henry Zell, late a private of Company D, Third Regiment United States Infantry, on the retired-list of the Army, to date from February 14, 1885, and that said Henry Zell have from said date the benefits and allowances given under the provisions of chapter 67, second session, Forty-eighth Congress, entitled "An act to authorize a retired-list for privates and non-commissioned officers of the United States Army who have served for a period of thirty years and upwards," approved February 14, 1885; and that said Zell be placed on said retired-list at the rank and grade held by him at the date of his last discharge from said service, the said Henry Zell having served in the Army of the United States for more than thirty years prior to his last discharge therefrom on April 1, 1879.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SOLDIERS' HOME IN STATE OF WASHINGTON.

The bill (S. 3629) granting to the State of Washington a section of public land for a soldiers' home, and for the militia of said State, and for other purposes was announced as next in order.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. MANDERSON. I have heard enough of the reading of that bill to be quite well satisfied that it will have to be guarded by some amendments. It certainly is not politic to establish just now additional soldiers' homes, but I have no objection to aiding the States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There are several amendments reported to the bill.

Mr. DOLPH. The soldiers' home, as I understand, is a State institution, and this is simply to provide for a grant of lands to aid it and for the benefit of the militia of the State of Washington.

Mr. MANDERSON. It strikes me as more than that as I heard the bill read. I ask that it be passed over until later in the day, so that I can examine it, especially as the Senators from the State are temporarily absent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

TONNAGE DUES ON VESSELS FROM SWEDEN AND NORWAY.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is a bill on the Calendar to give effect to a certain treaty that is of some importance and should be passed now. I think there will be no objection to it. It is reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations unanimously. It is Order of Business 1665, Senate bill 4102, and I venture to ask the Senate to consider it now. If there is any objection to it, I shall let it go over.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4102) to give effect to the eighth article of the treaty of commerce and navigation with Sweden and Norway of July 4, 1827. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to audit and pay to the persons authorized to receive the same all tonnage dues collected since July 1, 1834, on Swedish or Norwegian or American vessels arriving in ports of the United States from ports in Sweden and Norway, in excess of the rate of 3 cents a ton, or in the aggregate 15 cents a ton in any one year; and provides that such vessels arriving in the ports of the United States shall hereafter not be charged tonnage dues greater than those referred to in the eighth article of the treaty of 1827, between the United States and Sweden and Norway, if it shall appear to the President that no discrimination has been made by the Government of Sweden and Norway since June 26, 1834, against American vessels inconsistent with the provisions of article 8 of the treaty.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

If, upon consideration of said report and accompanying papers, the Secretary of the Treasury shall deem further investigation necessary, he may appoint a commission of not more than three persons, one of whom shall be an officer of the Treasury Department, which commission shall also examine the said proposed sites, and such others as the Secretary of the Treasury may designate, and grant such hearings in relation thereto as they shall deem necessary; and said commission shall, within thirty days after such examination, make to the Secretary of the Treasury written report of their conclusion in the premises, accompanied by all statements, maps, plats, or documents taken by or submitted to them, in like manner as hereinbefore provided in regard to the proceedings of said agent of the Treasury Department, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon finally determine the location of the building to be erected.

Mr. EVARTS. I ask leave to call attention to Order of Business 1654, which is a short bill to provide for a proper action in the district attorney's office of this District in the increase of the salaries of the employés. I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. 3555) to increase the compensation of the assistants to the attorney of the United States for the District of Columbia, and to amend section 907 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to said District, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

THOMAS P. MORGAN, JR.

The bill (S. 312) for the relief of Thomas P. Morgan, jr., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to Thomas P. Morgan, jr., $4,898.04, being the amount of work done by him on the Norfolk Harbor in the years 1881 and 1882, and declared forfeited to the United States by reason of his failure to perform his contract within the time specified therein.

Mr. PLATT. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PASCO in the chair). The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. WILSON, of Maryland, May 14, 1890:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 312) for the relief of Thomas P. Morgan, jr., having had the same under consideration, respectfully report:

This bill, or one of similar import, was favorably reported in the House during the Forty-eighth, Forty-ninth, and Fiftieth Congresses, and also favorably reported from the Senate Committee on Claims during the same Congresses. The report made in the Forty-eighth Congress from that committee by Senator GEORGE has been made the basis of all the subsequent reports, and your committee, believing the same to be justified by the facts in the case, do hereby adopt the same, and recommend the passage of the bill. That report is hereto annexed.

Mr. GEORGE, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following report (to accompany bill S. 2132):

The Committee on Claims have examined this case, and report the facts as follows:

That the claimant, Thomas P. Morgan, entered into a contract with the United States, through the Engineer Department, to do certain work and dredging in the harbor of Norfolk, Va. He failed to perform his contract, and it was declared by the engineer terminated, and the amount then due by the United States to the claimant forfeited. This sum amounts to $4,898.04, and was earned by the claimant, and his right to receive it lost only by a provision in the contract authorizing its forfeiture.

We find that this forfeiture was in strict accordance with the contract. There are, however, some equitable circumstances which we think ought to induce Congress to release the forfeiture, and thus pay the claimant for work actually performed. The contract was forfeited, not because the work done was not well done, but because the whole amount of work was not done within the time mentioned in the contract. The claimant asserts, and we think establishes, that the delay was occasioned in large measure by two circumstances, among others, over which he had no control.

First. The contract represented that all the dredging was to be done in soft earth, yet a considerable amount of hard excavation was excavated. This hard material could not be removed by the ordinary clam-dredge, which was entirely unsuitable for excavating soft material; this was the kind of dredge which the claimant owned and was working when the hard material was excavated.

Second. The commissioner of the harbor made some regulations in relation to the dumping ground at which claimant was required to dump the excavations. These regulations operated to hinder and delay claimant.

It is true an extension of the time for completing the contract was granted, but claimant was prevented from doing the work by unusual stormy weather. It is material, however, to be noticed that it is shown that if additional time to complete the contract had been given, as claimant asked, no delay would have resulted to the Government or the people by the delay in improving the harbor thereby occasioned. This we regard as a very material fact in allowing the relief we consider due.

Under all the circumstances we recommend the passage of the accompanying bill allowing said sum of $4,898.04.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTATE OF A. H. HERR.

The bill (S. 1559) for the relief of the estate of A. H. Herr, deceased, late of the District of Columbia, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 6, before the words "by the Secretary of War," to strike out "award made" and to insert "sum of $17,288.53, allowed the estate of A. H. Herr;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay the estate of A. H. Herr, deceased, late of the District of Columbia, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $17,288.53, allowed the estate of A. H. Herr by the Secretary of War for the use of his premises known as Herr's Island, near Harper's Ferry, by the Army during the late war.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. FAULKNER May 14, 1890:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1559) for the relief of the estate of A. H. Herr, have had the same under consideration and submit the following report:

This claim has been before Congress since the first session of the Forty-second Congress, and has received favorable consideration in both the House and Senate.

The report of Mr. ROWELL, made to the House of Representatives at the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress, is so full and conclusive that your committee have adopted it as a fair statement of the grounds for relief. He states: "This claim is for the use and occupation of Herr's Island, near Harper's Ferry, W. Va., by Federal troops from February, 1862, to February, 1866."

"The property in question was a very extensive and valuable estate, embracing 12 acres of land, thirty-two dwelling-houses, a large four-story cotton-factory building, a large iron foundry, saw-mill, and many outbuildings, and was all occupied at various times during the period named, and under control of acting quartermasters in the United States Army."

"Mr. Herr, the owner of the property, was a loyal citizen, who for his loyalty suffered imprisonment at the hands of the rebels and many other vexations, besides great destruction of property."

"February 28, 1866, Maj. Gen. W. S. Hancock made an order convening a board of officers to examine and report upon the condition of property in the department lately used by the Government, under the direction of the Quartermaster's Department, with a view of determining what would be required to put it in the same condition as when first occupied by the Government."

"In accordance with such order, the board convened and proceeded to examine the various property covered by the order, and on July 3, 1866, entered upon a critical examination of the property involved in this case, and of the evidence of its occupation, and its rental value; and reported in detail each building occupied, the time of its occupancy, and the rental value. The result of this examination was a report of a total rent of $17,288.53."

"This report was not approved by the Quartermaster-General, but the claim was by him referred to General Blunt, chief quartermaster Department of the Potomac, who, on December 27, 1866, made return of his conclusions, in which he stated that he had made personal examination of the premises, accompanied by his agent, and was satisfied that the buildings were occupied for military purposes for the whole of the time alleged in the claim. He expresses the opinion that the occupation tended to preserve the buildings from being destroyed by the rebels, and also says that the works not being in operation would prevent the owner from deriving any material benefit from it. Yet, he says, the Government derived material benefit from its use, and he carefully readjusts the estimates of the board of officers and recommends the allowance of $15,294.58."

"Upon receipt of this report Acting Quartermaster-General Rucker disallowed $3,408.33 of the claim and recommended the payment of $6,886.25."

"This reduction was made upon the statement in the report of General Blunt, that the occupancy of the property by the Army had the effect to protect it from destruction by the rebels, and the assumption that the works were not in operation, and therefore were of little use to their owner."

"This finding was approved by Quartermaster-General Meigs, but the claimant refused to accept the amount."

"Subsequently, the whole matter was referred to Deputy Quartermaster-General Ekin, who, on June 7, 1890, made an elaborate report upon the findings of the board of officers, the report of General Blunt, and the action of the Quartermaster-General on the same. He also considered additional evidence, which showed that the supposed facts in regard to the operation of this property by the owner, as reported by General Blunt, did not in reality exist, and that the condition of the property, with reference to its use by the owner, had been misunderstood."

"The report also combats the idea that its occupancy by the Union troops tended to preserve it from destruction."

"After reviewing the history of the case and reciting the evidence upon which his findings were based, the report concludes with the recommendation of an allowance of $15,000."

"This report is returned by the Quartermaster-General to General Ekin, with a suggestion that it is like another case cited. Whereupon General Ekin makes response as follows:

"The ruling in the Murfreesborough decision could be made applicable in this case, but in view of the fact that it has been the custom of this Department to pay rent for property at Harper's Ferry, which was occupied by the United States during the war, and in the absence of any law or order prohibiting its payment, I can not perceive any just reason why Mr. Herr should not be paid such rent as may be found to be due him."

"March 16, 1874, the claim was taken before the Secretary of War for review, who, upon examination of all the papers in the case, approved the finding of the board of officers convened by General Hancock, but on reference to the accounting officers the Third Auditor reported adversely, and the claim was disallowed by the Comptroller April 7, 1874—

"On the ground that the prohibitory act of February 19, 1867, was not repealed by the joint resolution of July 28, 1866, extending the benefit of the act of July 4, 1864, to the counties of Jefferson and Berkeley, W. Va."

"On reargument this decision was reaffirmed May 26, 1874.

"The case was finally reviewed by the Comptroller July 23, 1875. In that review he says:

"There is but one question now to be determined in the case. The claimant's loyalty and ownership, the occupancy of the property by the Federal forces, the proper administrative action in the War Department, and perhaps the amount of compensation to be allowed are all sufficiently shown."

"After reciting the various acts of Congress bearing upon the right to adjust and pay this claim, the report says:

"It [the act of 1867] expressly prohibits the settlement of certain claims originating in a State, or part of a State, described in the proclamation of July 1, 1862. . . . Jefferson County, Virginia, is among the counties described in that proclamation, and the prohibition, it seems to me, is as positive as if the act had repeated the words of the proclamation."

"And so this claim was rejected—not because it ought not to be paid, but because the Department before which it was pending was expressly prohibited by act of Congress from settling claims of this character."

"The committee are of the opinion that the allowance of this claim is an act of justice which ought not longer to be delayed for want of a tribunal in which to enforce it."

"Claimant's property was occupied by United States troops without any express agreement as to the amount of compensation. Its use was of great value to the Government, and effected a saving of much more than the amount claimed. Its occupancy was a necessity at the time. The officers taking possession and the claimant both supposed that reasonable rent was to be paid. Large damage was done to the property, for which no claim is made."

"Your committee would recommend that this bill (S. 1559) be amended in line 6 by striking out the words "award made" and inserting "sum of $17,288.53 allowed the estate of A. H. Herr," and as so amended we recommend that the bill do pass."

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to resolutions of December 21, 1889, and March 10, 1890, information relative to the withholding of patents for lands within the limits of the grant to the Union Pacific Railway Company, etc.; which, on motion of Mr. PLUMB, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

RAILWAY POSTAL CLERKS.

Mr. MITCHELL. The bill (S. 2508) to reclassify and fix the salaries of persons in the railway mail service known as railway postal clerks was passed over the other day. I ask that it be taken up. It was reported unanimously from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has been read. The amendment reported by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, line 6, after the word "railways," the committee report to insert "their necessary and actual expenses, but not exceeding," so as to make the section read:

That such railway postal clerks of class 7 as shall be detailed as chief clerks of divisions and such clerks as may be detailed as chief clerks of two or more lines shall, while traveling on the business of the Department, be paid from the appropriation for the transportation of the mail on railways their necessary and actual expenses, but not exceeding the sum of $3 per diem.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCPHERSON. This is a very important bill, and as the Senate is quite thin I suggest to the Senator from Oregon to let the bill go over.

Mr. MITCHELL. It has gone over twice heretofore, and I do not know that we are likely to have a fuller Senate than we have now. It is a matter of the greatest importance to the public service.

Mr. MCPHERSON. It seems to be a bill to reclassify and fix the salaries of persons in the railway mail service. Of course I do not know yet what the bill contains, but I think the Senate is too thin to consider it now.

Mr. MITCHELL. The matter was looked into pretty carefully by the committee and amended on the suggestion of the Department. There can be no objection to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is subject to objection. Does the Senator from New Jersey object to its consideration?

Mr. McPHERSON. No, I shall not object until I hear the bill read.

Mr. MITCHELL. Let the bill be read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read as amended.

The Secretary read the bill as amended, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That persons in the railway mail service, known as railway postal clerks, shall, on and after the passage of this act, be divided into seven classes, whose salaries shall not exceed the following rates per annum: First class, not exceeding $900; second class, not exceeding $800; third class, not exceeding $1,000; fourth class, not exceeding $1,200; fifth class, not exceeding $1,400; sixth class, not exceeding $1,500, and seventh class, not exceeding $1,800: Provided, That the Postmaster-General, in fixing the salaries of the clerks in the different classes, may fix different salaries for clerks of the same class according to the amount of work done and the responsibility incurred by each, but shall not in any case allow a higher salary to any clerk of any class than the maximum fixed by this act for the class to which clerk belongs.

SEC. 2. That such railway postal clerks of class 7 as shall be detailed as chief clerks of divisions, and such clerks as may be detailed as chief clerks of two or more lines, shall, while traveling on the business of the Department, be paid from the appropriation for the transportation of the mail on railways their necessary and actual expenses, but not exceeding the sum of $3 per diem.

Mr. McPHERSON. This is evidently to be a very great increase in the salaries of postal clerks, and I shall object to the consideration of the bill at the present time.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator withdraw the objection one moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon can proceed by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator from New Jersey is under a misapprehension when he believes that this is a very great increase in the salaries of railway mail clerks. It increases the number of grades. The number of grades at present is five. This increases the number to seven. It will cost about $29,800 to reorganize the service under the provisions of the bill, and there has been no reorganization of the railway mail service in this country for about eight years now, notwithstanding the immense increase of the business.

Mr. McPHERSON. Do I understand that the Postmaster-General has recommended it?

Mr. MITCHELL. Oh, yes.

Mr. SAWYER. I will say to the Senator from New Jersey that it simply makes two more grades, and the additional cost will be about $29,000.

Mr. MITCHELL. Twenty-nine thousand eight hundred dollars.

Mr. McPHERSON. As I understood the reading of the bill (and my recollection of the salaries paid to postal clerks is that it is now a very well paid service), it seemed to me as though the increase in salaries was very great. Then, from the reading of the bill I again discovered that there may be a great deal of favoritism with respect to officers in the same grade; all of which seems to me to be an unusual kind of legislation, and until the bill can be more thoroughly investigated and considered I must object to it.

Mr. MITCHELL. If the bill is going over, will the Senator allow me to say a word in answer to his remarks before it goes over, so that no wrong impression shall obtain against the bill?

Mr. McPHERSON. Very well.

Mr. MITCHELL. As I said before, there are at present five classes of railway mail service clerks. Under existing laws class No. 1 now receives not exceeding $800 per annum, and as much less as may be fixed by the superintendent of the railway mail service. This bill leaves it the same. Under existing law class No. 2 receives not exceeding $900, and as much less as the superintendent of the railway mail service may allow. Under the proposed bill those clerks receive the same. There is no increase at all. In class 3 the railway mail clerks receive under existing law $1,000 per annum. Under the proposed bill the same class will receive no more, just $1,000, or as much less as the superintendent of the railway mail service may be disposed to fix. Under existing law class 4 receives not exceeding $1,200. Under the proposed bill they receive just the same; there is no increase. The same is also true of class 5. Those clerks under existing law receive not exceeding $1,400 per annum, and under the proposed bill they are to receive no more.

So, as far as the first five classes are concerned there is no increase whatever—not a dollar. The bill does provide, which of course will lead to some little additional expense, for two or more classes, to be called classes number 6 and number 7. It is proposed to pay those who shall be allotted to class 6 $1,600 per annum, at least not exceeding that sum, and as much less as the superintendent of the railway mail service may fix; and it is proposed to pay those allotted to class 7, which will be a very small number, the sum of $1,800 per annum.

Mr. McPHERSON. Why does the Senator say "a very small number?"

Mr. MITCHELL. Because they are well fitted men who have advanced in the business, and on account of their qualifications and fitness they are to be sent out into the field.

I will call the attention of the Senate, and especially of the Senator from New Jersey, to the number now in the different classes, to show that it is the middle classes that have the large number of clerks. Under the existing arrangement the number of postal clerks in class 1 at the present time is 980, in class 2 the number is 1,163, in class 3 the number is 2,069, in class 4 the number is 752, and in class 5 the number is 676. So it will be observed that a large proportion, in fact the majority, of all these clerks are now included in class 3.

Mr. McPHERSON. I withdraw my objection to the bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. I thought the Senator would after the explanation. I am much obliged to him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The objection is withdrawn. The bill has been read, and the amendment of the committee has been agreed to. If there is no further amendment, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TEXARKANA AND FORT SMITH RAILWAY COMPANY.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 3, line 47, after the word "for," to insert "the same or," and in line 49, after the word "company," to strike out "If the judgment of the court shall be for the same sum as the award of the referees, then the costs shall be adjudged against the appellant;" so as to read:

If, upon the hearing of said appeal the judgment of the court shall be for the same or a larger sum than the award of the referees, the cost of said appeal shall be adjudged against the railroad company. When proceedings have been commenced in court the railway company shall pay double the amount of the award into court to abide the judgment thereof, and then have the right to enter upon the property sought to be condemned and proceed with the construction of the railroad.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 9, line 2, before the word "miles," to strike out "ten" and insert "fifty," and in line 3, before the word "years," to strike out "five" and insert "four;" so as to read:

That said railway company shall build at least 50 miles of its railway in said Territory within two years, and the remainder thereof and branches within four years after the passage of this act, or the rights herein granted shall be forfeited as to that portion not built.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill (S. 3833) to provide for the adjudication and payment of claims arising from Indian depredations was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. MOODY. I am very anxious to have that bill considered, but it is one that affects very many people and is of considerable importance and I will not ask its consideration with so few Senators in their seats to-day, unless some Senator who is interested in the bill desires to have it pressed to-day.

Mr. HALE. Let it go over, Mr. President.

Mr. PLATT. Without prejudice, of course.

Mr. PLATT. I wish the last clause of the bill to be read again.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the position of captain of cavalry in the Army of the United States, and to place him upon the retired-list of the Army as of that grade (the retired-list being thereby increased in number to that extent; and all laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are suspended for this purpose only.

Mr. TELLER. That is the ordinary rule.

Mr. DAVIS. I believe that is the usual form.

Mr. PLATT. That does not increase the retired-list of the Army after this matter expires?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly not.

Mr. PLATT. I thought as I caught the reading that it was a permanent increase of the retired-list, but I see it is not.

or expenditure, and without duplication of charitable work or expenditure; and all such appropriations shall be expended for the purposes indicated, under the general direction of said superintendent and in conformity, as near as may be, with such system or plan subject to the approval of the board of commissioners of the District of Columbia. And it shall also be the duty of said superintendent to examine into the character of the administration of said institutions and associations, and the condition, sufficiency, and needs of the buildings occupied for such charitable purposes, and also to ascertain in each case the amount contributed from private sources for support and construction, the number of paid employees, and the number of inmates received and benefited by the sums appropriated by Congress, and to recommend such changes and modifications therein as in his judgment will best secure economy, efficiency, and the highest attainable results, in the administration of charities in the District of Columbia. And said superintendent shall from time to time report in detail to the commissioners of the District, who shall communicate the same with their estimates for appropriation to the then next session of Congress, his doings hereunder, together with such estimates and recommendations for the future as in his judgment will best promote the charitable work of the District. Said superintendent shall be entitled to a compensation at the rate of $1,000 a year, which sum is hereby appropriated for this purpose for the fiscal year 1891. And all estimates submitted hereunder shall be included in the regular annual Book of Estimates."

And any company availing itself of the privilege herein granted shall within eighteen months wholly dispense with horses as motive power on all portions of its line, and substitute therefor the power provided for in the act making appropriations for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia, approved March 2, 1889, or pneumatic or other modern motive power which shall be approved by the commissioners of the District of Columbia; but nothing in this act shall in any wise authorize the use of overhead appliances: Provided, That if any such company operating a line or lines of street railroad from Georgetown or West Washington to and beyond the Capitol grounds shall fail to substitute for horse-power the power herein provided for on all of its lines within two years from the date of this act, such company shall forfeit its corporate franchises."

P. B. PLUMB,

H. L. DAWES,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

L. E. MCCOMAS,

J. C. CLEMENTS,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, will the Senator in charge of this bill and conference report state to the Senate what provisions are made touching the conduct and rights of railway companies in the District of Columbia; whether any additional privilege has been granted to them or any restriction placed upon their work?

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President—

Mr. GORMAN. I suggest, in view of the number of changes to be made, that this report go over until Monday and be printed, so that we can look at it. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator from Kansas now, but I suggest that the report go over. It is a very important matter.

Mr. PLUMB. I have no objection to its going over. The only point in favor of having it considered to-day is the fact that Monday is the last legislative day of the fiscal year, and if the report is not agreed to by Monday of course there must be some way devised for the purpose of meeting the expenses of the District; but, as the Senator from Maryland suggests, it is an important matter and it might as well go over. In the mean time I will answer the query of the Senator from Maine.

The Senate adopted an amendment to the bill in the course of its passage as to companies which were under certain obligations by reason of the act of 1889 to change their rails and motive power and issue additional stock for the purpose of meeting the expenses which might be required to be incurred under that act. The amendment was presented to me, I having charge of the bill, by a member of this body and submitted by me before it was offered to the Senate to the different members of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and it was adopted. The conferees have agreed upon an amendment to that amendment which authorizes any of these companies to issue stock at the market price to an amount sufficient to meet the expenses necessary in making the change required by the act of which I have spoken.

Mr. SPOONER. Does it give them the alternative of issuing bonds?

Mr. PLUMB. It gives them the privilege, I will say upon the inquiry of the Senator from Wisconsin, of issuing stock to an amount necessary to meet the expense, and it requires the companies availing themselves of this privilege to substitute other motive power for horse power within eighteen months of the passage of this act.

Mr. HALE. What other motive power?

Mr. PLUMB. It is provided that it shall be the motive power called for in the act of 1889 or other modern motive power, except that it shall not include the use of overhead electric wires.

Mr. HALE. That provision is maintained?

Mr. PLUMB. That is maintained.

Mr. HALE. Whatever restriction there is to prevent the use of this most monstrous and dangerous thing in a crowded city of an electric wire overhead is maintained?

Mr. PLUMB. That is maintained, and it is not only maintained by inference, but it is expressly provided for in precise terms.

Mr. HALE. To learn that was the object of my inquiry, and the Senator in giving this information has answered what I was seeking. I felt that under his eye nothing would be allowed in the way of extending the right of any company to use overhead electric wires.

Mr. PLUMB. Without going into the matter as to my own opinion, I have considered myself instructed upon all occasions when this question came up by the fact that the Senate intended to insist that there should be no overhead electric wires within the limits of the city proper, at all events.

Mr. HALE. And the Senator has looked to it that that is not encroached upon?

Mr. PLUMB. That is not encroached upon, but in answer to the inquiry in full in connection with that proposition as a further enlargement of the amendment which was put on the bill under the circumstances which I have stated, it is provided that certain companies, that is, such companies as have heretofore paid 10 per cent. dividends upon their stock, shall make a reduction of their fare to the extent of eight tickets for 25 cents, in place of six tickets, as now provided by law.

Mr. HALE. Is there any provision in this bill for the different companies giving transfer tickets where their lines cross?

Mr. PLUMB. No.

Mr. HALE. That has not been considered?

Mr. PLUMB. No. I will say further that all these provisions are applied exclusively to the lines now constructed. They do not apply to such lines as the present companies may hereafter construct, but only to the existing contracts, because the provision of the act of 1889 of which I have spoken, being found on the appropriation bill for that year, was applied only to the existing track lines, and all these provisions are made as amendments to that original provision and are by way of enlargement and amplification of it.

Mr. STEWART. The provision with regard to grooved rails is retained?

Mr. PLUMB. That was not touched at all.

Mr. STEWART. I think it ought to be touched, because I think the grooved rails are a detriment to travel in this city. They are a great nuisance, and I notice they are destroying the horses by causing hard pulling when the grooves are filled with gravel and the car runs on the flange. The grooves fill up and the cars run on the street instead of in the tracks. I see horses pulling here and dropping down during this hot weather, owing to the fact of the grooves being filled up. Some other device ought to be invented or arranged before these railroads are put to the expense of relaying their tracks. It is certain that these grooved rails will be abandoned. Any Senator who will take a little time to ride over these tracks and examine them will see the difficulty they have in pulling the cars running on the gravel in the groove. After you compel them to put down these grooved rails you will require the companies to take them up again because they cause harder pulling than would be necessary with a different character of rail. It is a great mistake to use rails of this character and it will subject the companies to great expense to put them down.

Mr. PLUMB. I want to say in regard to that that the committee did not consider itself instructed upon that point. It is a very embarrassing thing for a committee instructed to consider an appropriation bill to take up cases of this kind, which are in their nature legislative and are rather the subject of jurisdiction by other committees. But at the time of the passage of the previous bill of this character, the Senate by a unanimous vote put upon the appropriation bill a provision in regard to the class of rails and motive power to be employed in the District, which was afterwards put in shape by the conference and became the law to which I have referred. When we came to deal with this question, we only dealt with the point I have spoken of, and we only dealt with it within the fair scope of the amendment adopted by the Senate, and in the nature, it might be said, of exacting a penalty of certain companies in the future by reducing fares.

Now, I want to say about the question of the rail, that there is no other city in the Union, in my judgment, where railroad companies enjoying large and lucrative patronage would so long, or for any considerable length of time, defy all rules of common sense and responsibility and propriety as the railroads of the District of Columbia do. I never go up Pennsylvania avenue without regretting that we did not, before providing for the relaying of the pavement on that street, provide for taking the tracks entirely out of it. The condition of that street today, so far as relates to the use of it by the railway companies, is worse than it was before it was resurfaced. Instead of being a continuous oval, of which the tracks and the space between them shall be a part, there is an oval or half-oval extending from the curb to the track of the first rail, then an entirely separate arrangement as to the elevation and so on, until we get to the outside of the track, and then a half-oval to the curb again, whereby that part occupied by the railroad can not be used by the public as part of the street, and immediately succeeding a great rain, there is as to a large portion of that track on Pennsylvania avenue a sea of water, disgraceful to the company itself, supposing it was under no obligations about it except the obligations of decency to the community which furnishes it with its patronage, and disgraceful to the District in that those who govern it have permitted that thing to be done.

In addition to that there are humps rising above the level of the track, where apparently the ties have been raised in such a way as to throw above the ordinary level the asphalt with which the street is covered, and if not dangerous, it is at least inconvenient to get anywhere near the track. It is one of the most disgraceful things that I know of. As I said before, I have regretted that when we came to deal with the question of the resurfacing of Pennsylvania avenue we did not put that track entirely outside of the street, or else adopt some good plan of having it so relaid that the public would have the proper use of that street, and not be inconvenienced as they have been, and are daily being inconvenienced now.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator now whether we ought not to be able to rely upon the District commissioners, who are the representatives of the General Government and who are intrusted with the interests of the people in these things? Ought they not to insist upon more rigid rules for the convenience and protection of the public? Where does the fault lie?

Mr. PLUMB. Well, Mr. President, I do not care to apportion the responsibility, but, in the first place, I have no doubt the commissioners are at fault and the railroads are at fault. It seems to me amazing that the railroad companies, depending for their business in a certain measure upon the favor of the public, should not see what they owe to the public so obviously as to the things which have been spoken of here, that it was to their interest to be fair to the public and give them proper facilities, etc. But the District commissioners ought never to have allowed these tracks to be relaid; they ought never to have allowed a single car to be run over these tracks when they were relaid, until they were put in the condition which the law contemplated and which it is in the power of the commissioners to enforce.

I want to say another thing, that it is not only in regard to the tracks that run lengthwise in the streets, but when you come to a track that turns out, as at Seventh street, there is a ridge put up, which is a very serious thing to any person traveling in a carriage, and the streets that cross at right angles are in the same condition. What I have said is not limited to this railroad company. All the railroads in this city do just as they please; and when I speak of one, the Washington and Georgetown Company, I believe it is called, which runs on Pennsylvania avenue and Seventh street, I only speak of that by way of example, because my observation is that all of them totally disregard the public conveniences and public rights and have been allowed to do what they please here without any let or hindrance from the commissioners or anybody else.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to say that my observation is this: I do not believe there is a city in the United States where railroad companies have been allowed to run without let or hindrance and have paid no attention to the wants of the public or the rights of the public as they have in Washington. Somebody is at fault. Whether it is the commissioners of the District or the Committees on the District of Columbia, I do not know; but the whole population, the residents, visitors, members of Congress, and all persons who come to Washington are at the mercy of these railroad corporations that make little provision for the convenience of the public, and are continually imposing on the people.

I agree with the Senator from Kansas that it is not one company or one corporation, but all of them, that seem to be possessed with the idea that they can go on and do as they choose without any supervision or any control. Some day or other there will be a revolt and a change, and we shall have a different arrangement from what we have now.

Mr. GORMAN. I understood the Senator from Kansas to agree to let the report lie over until Monday, and that it should be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will lie over until Monday, and be printed, if there is no objection. The Chair hears none.

THE TARIFF BILL.

Mr. MORRILL. I present from the Committee on Finance, in accordance with the resolution of the Senate passed May 26, 1890, tables showing duties collected under existing tariff, notes explanatory of proposed changes from present law, and estimates of the probable effect upon the revenue.

I ask that the tables and accompanying notes may be printed and laid on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made, in the absence of objection.

Mr. PLUMB. Is that the report to accompany the tariff bill?

Mr. MORRILL. It is.

Mr. PLUMB. There will be considerable inquiry for that report. I believe, under the order just made, the usual number of 1,900 copies will be printed. I move that 5,000 extra copies of the report be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is hardly worth while to do that, because it is printed in another form on the old tariff bill. This is a very expensive affair, and I do not think that we should print any more than the usual number. Nobody will want copies except Senators.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not think it necessary to print more than the usual number.

Mr. PLUMB. Very well; I shall not press the motion now, at all events.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will lie on the table, and the usual number of copies will be printed.

ASA ELLIS.

The bill (H. R. 2361) for the relief of Asa Ellis, collector of internal revenue for the first collection district of California, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department in the settlement of the accounts of Asa Ellis as collector of internal revenue for the first collection district of California to allow him a credit of $810, that being the nominal value of certain special-tax stamps which were destroyed by accidental fire at Fresno, Cal., on the 12th of July, 1889, while in the custody of a deputy of the collector.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIZZIE WRIGHT OWEN.

The bill (S. 2841) granting a pension to Lizzie Wright Owen was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DOLPH in the chair). This bill has been heretofore read at length and the amendment of the Committee on Pensions has been agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTATE OF ISAAC P. TICE.

The bill (S. 2268) for the relief of the administrators of the estate of Isaac P. Tice, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It confers jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to retry and determine, according to law and in equity, the case of the administrators of Isaac P. Tice, deceased, against the United States, decided by the Supreme Court at the October term, 1878, and also to try and determine, according to law and in equity, his claims for money collected but not paid over to him under regulations of the Treasury, based upon his contract with the United States, and to render a judgment in favor of his administrators for such sums as may be found to be due and unpaid him on any of said accounts; and it appropriates the amount of money necessary to pay any judgment that may be rendered.

Mr. PLATT. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the following report, submitted by Mr. FAULKNER May 21, 1890:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2268) for the relief of the administrators of the estate of Isaac P. Tice, deceased, have examined the same and report:

Your committee adopt the report submitted by them during the first session of the Fiftieth Congress and recommend the passage of the bill.

The report is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 1185, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

This claim has been presented to the Forty-eighth and Forty-ninth Congresses and a favorable report was made in both Congresses by the Senate Committee on Claims, and also by the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives. The facts upon which the claimant rests his right to relief from Congress are so fully and ably presented in the reports made by the Committee on Claims of the Senate and the Committee on the Judiciary of the House that the committee has adopted both of the said reports as clearly presenting the rights of the claimant to relief.

They are as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1607) for the relief of the administrators of the estate of Isaac P. Tice, deceased, submit the following report:

That Isaac P. Tice, above named, was the inventor and patentee of a spirit meter, which was adopted for use in collecting the internal-revenue tax on spirits by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue April 17, 1867. Their authority for so doing is contained in section 15 of the act of Congress of March 2, 1867.

By their contract of April 17, 1867 (renewed September 18, 1868), the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue fixed the price of the meters, which were to be manufactured and supplied by Tice, provided that they should be attached to distilleries and paid for by distillers—the price to be paid by the distiller by depositing with the collector of internal revenue for his district a certificate of deposit payable to the order of Isaac P. Tice, this certificate to be forwarded to Tice through the Bureau of Internal Revenue when the meter should be attached. The contract also provided that on its suspension or abrogation Tice should be paid by the Government for such meters as he should have on hand or in process of manufacture, not exceeding twenty sets.

The contract, so far as the manufacture of meters was concerned, was suspended June 8, 1870, and finally canceled absolutely June 8, 1871. On June 8, 1870, Tice had on hand about fourteen and one-half sets of meters in process of manufacture. He also had due him for meters delivered prior to that time a large sum of money, which has never been turned over to him by the Treasury, although paid in to collectors by distillers. The meter itself is said to have been of great value in increasing the revenue from spirits.

Tice, after the final cancellation of his contract, spent some time in trying to get his claim allowed in the Department until his premature death in 1875. His attorney, Mr. E. N. Taft, of New York, became unable about the same time, by reason of the failure of his health, to attend to any business, but the papers and data pertaining to Tice's claims remained in his office until about 1880, when they were obtained by the present administrators to aid in the presentation of the present bill for relief, etc.

In the mean time an attempt was made in the name of the estate by a former administrator, without possession of the proofs in Taft's custody, to establish a claim for the "meters on hand," which claim was defeated in the Court of Claims on the law and failure of proof of fact. (See C. Cls. R., p. 112.) The United States Supreme Court, however, held, on appeal, that the court below erred as to the law, but affirmed for failure of proof. (See 99 U. S. R., page 287.) Such proofs and means of proof have since come to light, and have been submitted to this committee.

The present bill permits the claimants to prosecute in the Court of Claims on the whole of their claims, and freed from the bar of the statute of limitations.

This committee thinks that the laches, or apparent laches, of the claimants have been fairly accounted for, and that the present bill gives nothing but what exact justice to the Government will permit, to wit, a day in court on the whole case upon the merits in law and equity.

The Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives at the present session of Congress have made favorable report upon a House bill identical in language with the one under consideration. The report is so full and complete, and such a satisfactory showing, that your committee herewith annex the said report, omitting, however, the exhibits attached thereto, being as follows: Letter, with accompanying statements, showing amounts received for account of Tice from Hon. Green B. Raum, Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to the Secretary of the Treasury, dated February 2, 1883, and affidavits of the following parties, showing number of meters on hand in June, 1870, namely, W. J. Cotter, Jr., Jesse B. Badeau, C. F. Mead, and Francis W. Clark. Reference is hereby made to said exhibits, which are important, and will be found in Report No. 1972, present session House of Representatives.

Your committee concur with the House Committee on the Judiciary in recommending the passage of the bill.

The Committee on the Judiciary, to which has been referred House bill 5092, beg leave to report:

Isaac P. Tice invented a meter which, when attached to a distillery, measured the quality and strength of spirits distilled. It was adopted under the act approved March 2, 1867 (14 United States Statutes, 481).

The facts of the case and the law arising thereon are fully stated by Mr. Justice Harlan in the case of Tice vs. United States in the Supreme Court (93 United States Reports, 286) on appeal from the decision of the Court of Claims (13 Court of Claims Reports, 112).

The committee can not do better than insert the whole judgment of the Supreme Court, which is as follows:

"By an act approved March 2, 1867 (14 Stat., 481), the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to 'adopt, procure, and prescribe' for use hydrometers, weighing and gauging instruments, meters, or other means for ascertaining the strength and quality of spirits subject to tax, or for the prevention or detection of frauds by distillers of spirits.

"On the 18th April, 1867, the Secretary adopted the Tice meter, and prescribed its use in distilleries, upon certain agreed conditions fully set forth in a letter to the inventor. Among those conditions were these: 'The Secretary of the Treasury holds himself at liberty at any time to adopt any improvement or modification of the meter or system, or at any time to revoke the order adopting the meter, and to discontinue their manufacture on behalf of the Government. If the first meter shall prove successful when subjected to the test above set forth, and the Government shall subsequently revoke the adoption of the meter and order a discontinuance of proceedings, you will be paid such sum as may be determined upon in the manner hereinafter stated, for all instruments which you may have completed, or have in process of completion at the time of revocation; provided that at no time shall you have more than twenty sets in process of manufacture at any one time, unless directions shall be given hereafter for the manufacture of a larger number.'

"By joint resolution passed February 3, 1868, Congress directed the appointment, by the Secretary of the Treasury, of a commission which, in connection with the then existing commission of the Academy of Science, should examine all meters and mechanical contrivances or inventions presented to them which were intended to measure, test, and ascertain the productiveness of grain or other articles prepared for distillation, at the actual quantity and strength of distilled spirits subject to tax, produced therefrom, the result of such examination to be communicated to Congress. The act declared 'that pending the action of said commission, and until their report be made, and a meter shall by law be adopted, all work on the construction of meters, under the direction of the Treasury Department, be and is hereby suspended.' 'And in the mean time no further contract shall be made by the Secretary of the Treasury' under the act of March 2, 1867.

"By an act approved July 20, 1868 (15 Stat., 125), power to 'adopt and prescribe' meters was conferred upon the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. That officer, on September 16, 1868, decided to adopt and prescribe the Tice meter, and upon certain conditions, to which the inventor assented, he directed the latter 'to proceed with their construction.' Among the conditions were these:

"Third. The 117 meters now finished will be immediately made ready for delivery, and 36 now in process of manufacture will be completed as soon as possible. The manufacture of others, to the number of 500 in all, is to be proceeded with as rapidly as possible, and thereafter not more than twenty sets are to be in process of construction at one time, unless a greater number is directed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

"Fourth. The Commissioner reserves to himself, or his successor in office, the right at any time to adopt any improvement of the meter or system, or to revoke the order adopting the meter, and to direct on the part of the Government a discontinuance of its manufacture.'

"On the 7th June, 1870, the Commissioner ordered the discontinuance of that kind of Tice meter known as the second or 'credit' meter, and required distilleries to use thereafter the Tice sample meter, and the Tice automatic meters adapted for use as sample meters.

"On the succeeding day, June 8, 1870, the Commissioner addressed to Tice a letter, in which, among other things, he gave notice that instructions and regulations in force prior to October 8, 1869, 'relating to the ordering and shipment and payment for the meters invented by you and prescribed for use in distilleries, remain in force only in respect to meters heretofore delivered, and also those you may now have on hand, or in process of construction, not exceeding twenty sets.' In that letter the Commissioner further says: 'Any regulations heretofore prescribed, addressed to you by or from this office, directing or authorizing you to construct, or proceed with the construction of, or to furnish, meters, especially those of September 16, 1868, are revoked, except as aforesaid. New rules, regulations, and orders have been prescribed, a copy of which is herewith inclosed, it being distinctly understood that neither the Government of the United States nor any Department or officer thereof is or will be responsible for or on account of any spirit meters, or the attachment or adjustment thereof.

"By a formal order made on June 7, 1871, the further use of Tice's spirit meters was finally discontinued, and all existing orders prescribing the same were revoked. At the date of that order Tice had on hand 14½ sets of meters, worth $25,000, for which sum, and for the storage up to April 8, 1873, the estate of Tice rendered an account against the Government on the 12th of April, 1873. The account was approved by the then Commissioner, but payment being refused, this action was brought against the Government for the recovery of the sum claimed.

"From a judgment in the Court of Claims in favor of the Government this appeal is prosecuted.

"We concur with the learned counsel for appellants in the proposition that the contract made on the 18th of April, 1867, by the Secretary of the Treasury with Tice was not abrogated by the joint resolution of February 3, 1868. By the terms of the resolution it was only suspended until final action by the commission, whose report was designed as the foundation of a statute which would designate the kind of meters which should be adopted. But express authority to make a new contract was conferred by the act of July 20, 1868, upon the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. That officer was empowered to adopt and prescribe for use such hydrometers, saccharometers, weighing and gauging instruments or meters as he might deem necessary. The extent of the authority intended to be conferred upon him as manifested by the third section of the act of July 20, 1868, which required every owner, agent, or superintendent of a distillery to furnish and attach, at his own expense, such meter as the Commissioner might adopt and prescribe for use.

"It was by virtue of its provisions that the agreement of September 16, 1868, was made. And, according to any fair construction of its terms, in the light of attendant circumstances, the Government was bound, as under the agreement of September 18, 1867, to pay for such sets, not exceeding twenty, as Tice might have on hand at the time their use should be discontinued. The provision to that effect in the contract of April 18, 1867, is so reasonable and just that we shall not presume that the contract of September 16, 1868, was intended to establish a different rule of compensation to the inventor. But we do not perceive, however, that all this justifies the conclusion that the Government was under any legal obligation to pay for the meters which Tice had on hand on June 8, 1871, and for the value of which the account in question was presented. By the express words of the agreement of September 16, 1868, the Commissioner had the right at any time to revoke the order adopting the meter, and to direct the discontinuance of its manufacture on behalf of the Government. That power was partially exerted by the order of June 7, 1870, which dispensed with the further use of all Tice meters, except the sample meters or the automatic meters adopted for use as sample meters.

"But the power of revocation and discontinuance was fully exerted by the sweeping order of June 8, 1870, which, reserving the rights of Tice as to all meters theretofore delivered, and as to such as were then on hand or in process of construction, not exceeding twenty sets, revoked all previous regulations which directed or authorized the inventor to construct, or proceed with the construction of, or to furnish, meters, and especially the regulation of September 16, 1868. By that order distinct notice was given to the patentee that neither the Government of the United States nor any Department or officer thereof was or would be responsible for or on account of any spirit meters or the attachment or adjustment thereof.

"The order of June 8, 1870, did not, perhaps, discontinue the use of meters altogether, but it clearly furnished notice that the patentee could not look to the Government for protection or reimbursement as to any meters thereafter constructed by him and used by distilleries. The meters for which the account was rendered were on hand on June 7, 1871, when all existing orders prescribing the same for use were absolutely revoked and the further use of Tice meters discontinued. Had they been on hand and in the process of construction at the date of the order of June 7, 1871, we would not doubt the liability of the Government for their value. But no such fact is found, and we suppose no such fact could have been established.

"While we do not agree with the court below in all the reasons assigned in support of the conclusion reached, we think its judgment is in accordance with the law, and it is affirmed."

It thus appears that had the claimant's administrator proved that Tice had the 14½ meters on hand on the 8th of June, 1870, the recovery would have been allowed.

It will be seen that the estate of Tice presented this claim to the Government April 12, 1873, which was approved by the then Commissioner, but not paid. This fact shows that Tice had died before that date. His attorney became ill, and the papers of the attorneys were in such confusion as to disable the administrator of Tice to get at the facts which were evidenced by the papers. And it seems that the case was supposed to turn upon the question whether the meters were on hand in July, 1871, and not at the prior date of June 8, 1870. They were no doubt on hand in July, 1871, and the only question is, under the decision of the Supreme Court, were they on hand in June, 1870?

Depositions have been laid before the committee of four witnesses to supply this proof, and are persuasive to that result; and the question remains, shall the administrator be allowed a hearing in the Court of Claims, where he may establish this fact?

There is no sufficient ground, perhaps, accounting for the failure to prove this fact, to induce a court to award a new trial, even were a motion made for the purpose in due time. But your committee do not think that the leave should be denied by the Government when there may be proof furnished to establish a just claim under contract by a citizen against it.

Where there is no fraud, and the evidence may be sifted by a court, your committee sees no danger to result from allowing a rehearing at all comparable with the injustice of denying it to a real creditor of the Government, and under these circumstances such relief should be extended to the claimant.

A second claim for about $140,000 is now presented, based upon the alleged fact that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, by an order in January, 1869, directed the collectors to take the certificates of deposits in the collector's name from the distilleries for the price of the meters furnished, instead of making them payable to Tice. Thus the collectors of the Government intercepted the funds due to Tice, and much due to him was paid into the Treasury.

The Government thus assumed a quasi fiduciary relation to Tice, receiving his moneys with a liability to account to him. This being so, and no account with him having been had, and no tender by the proper officer, as far as appears, to do so, it is not a proper case for the Government to insist upon lapse of time, or any limitation to protect itself against the just demand of one whose money the Government has received, intercepted, and withholds, especially where all the papers and evidences of claim are in the hands of the Government, and not in those of the claimant. If the Government has his money there is no just reason why he should not be allowed in its Court of Claims to assert his right and prove from the records of its office the amount it has so received and withholds from him.

The letter of the late Commissioner Baum is hereto annexed, and the account of moneys admitted to have been collected on his account. They show that the Treasury holds his money, and there is no just reason why Tice's administrator should not receive it upon due proof.

Your committee therefore report the bill referred, with a recommendation that it do pass.

Your committee also annex the depositions of Badeau, Cotter, Mead, and Clark.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

The committee would, therefore, report Senate bill 987 favorably, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Before the reading was concluded—

Mr. PLATT. I do not ask for the further reading of the report. What led me to ask for its reading was that there had been a decision by the Supreme Court, and the way the bill read I supposed it was proposed to have the Court of Claims try the case over again, although the decision of the Supreme Court had been unfavorable to it, but I find, on examination, that the decision of the Supreme Court was adverse to the former action of the Court of Claims. Therefore I make no further objection to the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SHIPPING COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. FRYE. The Senate yesterday passed the bill (S. 3787) to amend the laws relative to shipping commissioners. There are two typographical errors in it, and I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading, and the vote by which it was passed, may be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The bill is before the Senate, and open to amendment.

Mr. FRYE. In line 7, I move to strike out the word "said" before "chapter;" and in line 8, before the word "public," to strike out "such" and insert "the;" so as to read:

That when a crew is shipped by a shipping commissioner for any American vessel in the coastwise trade, or the trade between the United States and the Dominion of Canada, or Newfoundland, or the West Indies, or Mexico, as authorized by section 2 of chapter 421 of the public laws passed by the Forty-ninth Congress, an agreement shall be made with each seaman engaged as one of such crew in the same manner and form, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. I now ask that the bill be ordered to a third reading, and passed as amended.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN FINN.

The bill (S. 921) for the relief of John Finn was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, in line 5, after the word "mules," to strike out "with legal interest;" in line 15, after the word "originated," to insert "and that the said horses and mules thereby became the property of the United States;" and in line 17, after the word "mules," to strike out "with legal interest from the date the claim accrued;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of John Finn, of St. Louis, Mo., successor to the firm of John Finn & Co., for the value of twenty-four horses and seventy-eight mules, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, with jurisdiction to hear, determine, and allow the same; and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the said court that the said horses and mules were duly inspected and accepted assailable for the service for which they were intended by an officer of the United States, under the regulations, practice, or custom in force in and observed by the quartermaster's department at St. Louis, Mo., in the purchase of horses and mules for the Government at the time the said claim originated, and that the said horses and mules thereby became the property of the United States, the court shall render judgment for the agreed price of said horses and mules; Provided, That said court shall hear and determine said claim, notwithstanding the bar of any statute of limitation to the contrary; And provided further, That all the testimony taken in Congressional case No. 127, and also in case No. 15223, upon the subject of this claim now on file in the office of the clerk of the Court of Claims may be used and read in evidence upon the hearing and trial of the claim herein mentioned; subject, however, to the objections of either party as to its competency, relevancy, and materiality.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CENSUS SUPERVISORS AND ENUMERATORS.

The bill (S. 3873) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for taking the Eleventh and subsequent censuses," approved March 1, 1889, and amended January 23, 1890, in relation to the compensation of supervisors and enumerators of census, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that any supervisor or enumerator of census who shall receive any bonus, fee, or other consideration of any character whatsoever in connection with his duties as supervisor or enumerator, in addition to his compensation authorized by the act of March 1, 1889, as amended by the act of January 23, 1890, or any person or persons, municipality or corporation, who shall pay or attempt to pay any such bonus, fee, or other consideration to any supervisor or enumerator of census, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, shall be fined not exceeding $5,000 and be imprisoned not exceeding two years.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CRUELTY TO CHILDREN IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. INGALLS. I understand that during my temporary absence from the Chamber, Order of Business 1286, Senate bill 2476, was passed over informally without prejudice. It relates to a subject of great importance to the people of the District, and appeals strongly to the sense of humanity; and I ask that it may be now taken up and considered.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2476) to prevent cruelty to children in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the amendments be acted upon as they are reached in reading the text.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That course will be pursued in the absence of objection.

The first amendment of the Committee on the District of Columbia was, in section 4, line 2, after the word "shall," to strike out "annually;" in line 3, after the word "public," to insert "or private," and in line 7, after the word "school," to strike out "or if such child has attended for a like period of time a private school;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That every person having under his control a child between the ages of eight and fourteen years shall cause such child to attend for at least six months some public or private school; and for every neglect of such duty the person offending shall forfeit a sum not exceeding $20; but if the person so neglecting was not able, by reason of poverty, to send such child to school, or if such child has been otherwise furnished for a like period of time with the means of education, or has already acquired the branches of learning taught in the public schools, or if his physical or mental condition is such as to render such attendance inexpedient or impracticable, such penalty shall not be incurred.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of section 5.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I do not think that bill ought to be considered with this thin Senate and in the time that is allowed for debate upon it. I object to its further consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made to the consideration of the bill, it will go over. Does the Senator desire it to go over without prejudice?

Mr. MORGAN. I have no objection to its remaining on the Calendar without prejudice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will retain its place on the Calendar.

AMENDMENT TO INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9356) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891.

J. L. CAIN AND OTHERS.

The bill (S. 151) for the relief of J. L. Cain and others was announced as next in order.

Mr. INGALLS. I suggest the want of a quorum, Mr. President. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The want of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll of the Senate.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allison,	Cullom,	Jones of Nevada,	Plumb,
Bate,	Davis,	McMillan,	Power,
Berry,	Dawes,	Manderson,	Sawyer,
Blackburn,	Dolph,	Mitchell,	Spooner,
Blair,	Frye,	Morgan,	Teller,
Carlisle,	George,	Paddock,	Walthall,
Casey,	Gorman,	Payne,	Washburn.
Coke,	Hawley,	Pierce,
Colquitt,	Ingalls,	Platt,

During the roll-call—

Mr. BATE. I wish to say that my colleague [Mr. HARRIS] is too sick to be in the Chamber. He was here, but was compelled to leave on account of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-four Senators have responded to their names. A quorum is not present.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I had hoped that the Senate would remain in session long enough to consider the conference report on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill this evening. It is very important that that bill should be passed before the 1st of July.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. INGALLS. No business can be transacted; there is no quorum present, and debate is not in order upon any subject.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I move that we adjourn until 11 o'clock on Monday morning.

Mr. INGALLS. That is not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the motion is not in order in the absence of a quorum.

Mr. DAWES. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. PADDOCK. I hope we shall have the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator give way to allow me to make a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business?

Mr. INGALLS. That can not be done in the absence of a quorum. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] has called for the yeas and nays on the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SPOONER. What is the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the motion to adjourn.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MORRILL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], but I do not think he would wish me to refrain from voting on this question, and I vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded; and the result was announced—yeas 4, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—4.
Berry,	George,	Jones of Nevada,	Walthall.
NAYS—28.
Allison,	Davis,	Manderson,	Platt.
Bate,	Dawes,	Mitchell,	Plumb,
Blair,	Dolph,	Morgan,	Power,
Carlisle,	Frye,	Morrill,	Sawyer,
Casey,	Gorman,	Paddock,	Spooner,
Coke,	Hawley,	Payne,	Teller,
Cullom,	McMillan,	Pierce,	Washburn.

ABSENT—32.
Aldrich,	Dixon,	Hiscock,	Sanders,
Allen,	Edmonds,	Hoar,	Sherman,
Barbour,	East,	Ingalls,	Squire,
Blackburn,	Evarts,	Jones of Arkansas,	Stanford,
Blodgett,	Faulkner,	Keena,	Stewart,
Brown,	Gibson,	McPherson,	Stockbridge,
Butler,	Gray,	Moody,	Turpie,
Call,	Hale,	Pattigrew,	Vance,
Cameron,	Hampton,	Pugh,	Voorhees,
Chandler,	Harris,	Quay,	Wilson of Iowa,
Cockrell,	Hearst,	Ransom,	Wilson of Md.
Colquitt,	Higgins,	Reagan,	Wolcott.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No quorum has voted.

Mr. FRYE. Call the roll.

Mr. DAWES. How many Senators answered to their names on the roll-call before the motion to adjourn?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-four Senators responded to their names on the roll-call, and thirty-two have voted on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. PLATT. Let the roll be called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum was developed on the roll-call previous to the motion to adjourn. The Senate can remain in session as long as it is its pleasure to do so. The Chair supposes the only motion in order would be a motion to direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to invite or compel the attendance of absent Senators or to adjourn.

Mr. ALLISON. I had hoped this afternoon that further progress would have been made with the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, but as that seems impracticable, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, June 30, 1890, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, June 28, 1890.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN, D. D.

APPROVAL OF THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the Journal will be considered approved.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the Journal by striking out that part of it which shows the passage of the following bills: H. R. 8078, 9024, 10122, 5144, 5308, 7869, 8532, 4921, 3018, 4930, 2430, 8259, 2802, 7338, 2174, 2128, 10445, 5521, 8584, 5028, 2229, 5131, 5065, 2965, 9317, 9580, 8309, 4553, 7659, 2512, 3606, 9424, 9244, 2003, 3706, 8822, 6916, 2420, 7734. Also the following Senate bills: 1902, 1681, 2369, 1003, 2309, 1304, 1302, 503, 1365, 1064, 1082, 1741, 513, 1446, 1817, 2200, 2734.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman please reduce his proposition to writing?

Mr. ENLOE. If the Chair requires that it be reduced to writing it will take some few minutes to do it. I want to state, Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must reduce his proposition to writing.

Mr. GEAR. Pending that I ask the consideration of a conference report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that can not be done pending the approval of the Journal.

While Mr. ENLOE was writing his motion the following proceedings took place:

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that it will consume a great deal of time to have this motion reduced to writing.

Mr. PAYSON. That seems to be the object.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not think it is the object of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] to take up the time assigned for the discussion of the election bill. The gentleman has some views in regard to the passage of these bills that he desires to bring out on this motion, and as he is required to reduce his proposition to writing I suggest that the approval of the Journal go over until Monday. In the mean time the gentleman can have his motion put in shape so that we can understand the point of it, and meanwhile we shall not consume the time which is required for debate upon the pending bill in an unprofitable discussion upon this point of order, as I presume it is, which the gentleman from Tennessee desires to make in regard to the Journal. I move, therefore, to postpone the further consideration of the question of the approval of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings until Monday morning immediately after the reading of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] has the floor on the question which he is presenting.

Mr. SPRINGER. I know; but he is reducing his motion to writing, and that will take considerable time.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House take a recess for twenty minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] has the floor. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, would a motion to approve the Journal be in order at this time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Speaker, I now submit my motion.

The motion was read as above.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Speaker, I make this motion on the ground that these bills which are reported in the Journal this morning as having passed at the evening session yesterday were beyond the jurisdiction of that session, having been carried over from a previous Friday evening session and made the special order immediately after the reading of the Journal on the Wednesday following the session that is reported in the RECORD of June 10. At that session these bills were taken up, considered, and ordered to a third reading, and were carried over until the following Wednesday, with the previous question ordered upon them. The RECORD shows this fact. Here is what occurred:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee requests that those bills favorably reported from the Committee of the Whole, and also the bills called up by members and read a third time, be made the special order for Wednesday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal, with the understanding that there may be twenty minutes for debate on each of these bills.

Mr. MCCREARY. The result will be to defeat the consideration of any other business.

Mr. ENLOE. As there is only the right given for debate, if nobody desires to occupy the time it will not be used.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bills are to be taken up on their final passage, with the right of twenty minutes of debate on each of these bills. If there is no objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Now, I find that on yesterday evening these bills were laid before the House by the Chair as unfinished business, and the following proceedings took place in reference to them:

Mr. KILGORE. I have just come in, and I would like to know what bills these are.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Those that were considered two weeks ago, and have come over as unfinished business.

Mr. KILGORE. There was an order made as to each one carrying it into a full House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No; those two as to which that order was made have not been brought up for consideration, and will not be. There are two bills, as the gentleman from Texas will remember, upon which the previous question was ordered, and it was agreed that there should be thirty minutes' debate on those.

Mr. KILGORE. But the bills of the entire session one night were ordered to a full House.

Mr. BAKER. They have all been passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. They were made the special order for a certain day, and that day having passed they were brought up to-night as unfinished business.

Mr. KILGORE. That relates to the bills considered just now?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. They were considered two weeks ago to-night.

Mr. KILGORE. What is the reason they were not disposed of in the regular order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman will remember, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] consented that they might be read a third time, but he did not consent that the previous question should be ordered or that they should be passed that evening; hence no arrangement was made and they were laid aside. They were to be brought up as unfinished business.

And after that kind of colloquy, which continued for some time, with the repetition of the statement on the part of the Chair that these bills were brought up as unfinished business, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] finally expressed the serious nature of his opposition to these bills by saying:

Well, now, there may be some bills in that lot I would like to cut off. There are some that I should have cut off had not the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] taken the contract.

Thereupon the bills were put upon their passage in bulk, and passed through this House.

I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that according to the ruling of the Chair, when those bills were carried over with the previous question ordered upon them, made a special order for a certain day with the right of debate, and when the House failed to consider them on that day, they lost their status, and it was necessary that the Committee on Rules should bring into the House an order fixing a time for the consideration of those bills before they could be properly considered. Upon that ground I make this motion to amend the Journal.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, on the gentleman's own showing these bills were properly before the House last night. Having been made a special order in the House and that special order not having been executed, they fell back to where they would have been otherwise; that is, they became the unfinished business of Friday night, and could not have been taken out of that position without an order made at such a session, or upon a special order adopted upon a report of the Committee on Rules. These bills last evening were exactly where they could be properly considered; they were in their proper place to be considered by the House, and the disposition of them at that time was exactly in accordance with the proper and regular order of procedure. They were taken up as unfinished business and by unanimous consent put upon their passage. There is, therefore, nothing to correct in the Journal, and I move the previous question upon the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. ENLOE. One remark in reply to what has just been said by the gentleman from Illinois. These bills, as I understand, occupied exactly the status occupied under the ruling of the Speaker by the bankrupt bill, which had been made a special order, and not being considered under the special order, the Speaker held that it had lost its status.

Mr. SPRINGER. That bill went back to the Calendar, and was only in order when reached upon the Calendar. If we had reached it upon the Calendar, it would have been in order to take it up. But we have never been able to get there for the disposition of that bill. As to these pension bills, however, we consider the Calendar every Friday night; and last night those bills were in order. That is the difference.

Mr. ENLOE. I am not parliamentarian enough, perhaps, to be able to contend with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] or with the Chair—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has moved the previous question.

Mr. ENLOE. But I want to state that at these Friday night sessions from this time forward there must be a quorum or business must be done differently.

The SPEAKER. The demand for the previous question cuts off debate. The question is upon ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion of Mr. ENLOE to correct the Journal was rejected.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Journal as read will be approved.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The regular order being demanded, the House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11045) to amend and supplement the election laws of the United States, etc.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McAdoo] is recognized for twenty minutes.

Mr. McADOO. Mr. Speaker, our fathers who founded this Government had felt in the land which they left the baneful effects of a strong centralized government buttressed by the iniquitous feudal land tenures. They had seen such government repress the sacred liberty of conscience, invade the right of property by an abuse of the taxing power, and eternally trample down the first substantial foundation of liberty, local self-government. In the vast and unexplored regions of this new continent, to which they had sailed through wintry seas and unknown perils, they determined to make one last stand for individual liberty of person and conscience and the cardinal principle of the American Constitution, home rule. Dangers of a possible secession were no more to them than those of imperial consolidation. A Switzerland, limited in its territory and contracted in its resources, was more attractive to those men than the illimitable domains of a Russia presided over by autocrat.

The cardinal principles of American liberty which they evolved in the United States Constitution were these: Federal unity, local sovereignty, and individual liberty, a heaven-born trinity to bless mankind. From the moment that this grand American idea, which may be called the very quintessence and soul of the Constitution, was enunciated by these men, it started out for universal conquest. It stirred the soul of France. A strong, centralized, oppressive Government, absolutism and feudalism, went up in the burning rafters of the Bastille. To the Irish patriots, who had struggled for seven hundred years for liberty and nationality, this grand cardinal principle flamed out in their darkened heavens like the cross of Constantine with its motto, "In hoc signo vinces."

It thundered in the British Parliament and in the Irish House of Commons; it illuminated the pathway of the martyrs of that land on their way to the dungeon, the gibbet, and to life-long, weary exile in the wild forests of the antipodes; it nerved the arm of Poland to strike at the rude, barbaric, strong government of Northeastern Europe; it shook the throne of Austria and begat a free parliament in Hungary; it sweeps to-day in triumph along the confines of the northern seas in Norway and Sweden; it reigns eternal in the mountains of Switzerland; it is the dominant idea among all the republics of South America; it created the confederacy of the Canadian Dominion; it marches to fresh victories in the great countries of the South Pacific; it is voiced by almost superhuman eloquence and wisdom in the British Parliament by a Gladstone, and it thunders in the Spanish Senate from a Castelar and finds multitudinous advocates the world around from lesser if not less zealous men, while here on this beautiful June day, in the year 1890, in the American Congress, in the House of its professed friends, it is proposed by this infamous measure to strike it to the very heart by a bill which, taking the political and all other conditions existing in the two countries into consideration, would not be fathered by the reactionary Salisbury in the Parliament of the country from which we wrung our now imperiled liberties by the sword.

I will not have time, Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes allotted to me in this discussion to enter into a consideration of the constitutional objections to this measure; but I wish here, on my honor as a Representative, to say that I have no doubt whatever that this measure is against the letter as well as the spirit of the Constitution. [Applause on Democratic side.] And to gentlemen on the other side who are not accustomed to as closely construe that instrument as we are I submit that the words of Mr. Jefferson advising moderation and conservatism in the construction of that document are applicable. Mr. Jefferson, writing to Mr. Cabell, in 1814, in reference to the construction of the Constitution with regard to the qualifications of members of the Congress, used this language:

If wherever the Constitution assumes a single power out of many which belong to the same subject we should consider it as assuming the whole, it would invest the General Government with a mass of power never contemplated. On the contrary the assumption of particular powers seems an exclusion of all not assumed.

I have always thought that when the line of demarcation between the powers of the General and the State governments was doubtfully or indistinctly drawn, it would be prudent and praiseworthy in both parties never to approach it but under the most urgent necessity.

We have gone on since that day, Mr. Speaker, for nearly one hundred years with the States managing their own elections, and with full control of the elections for Federal Representatives in the hands of the States, which, by the Constitution of the United States, are the only sources to declare the qualifications of the electors; and what urgent necessity exists at this day, when this prevailing system is in operation, when we have adjusted ourselves to the changed conditions produced by the civil war—what new necessity or what exigency exists that we shall strain the Constitution, absolutely strain the very foundation upon which the Republic itself exists, and invade the rights of American freemen with hordes of mercenary spies in the hands of a political party to control elections in the States? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If I had time, Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to give what appears to me to be a plain construction of this clause in the Constitution, and which reads as follows:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of choosing Senators.

In the very beginning the States themselves were the reservoirs of power. They got no power from the Federal Constitution. They breathed the life itself into the Federal Government; and as to that clause which provides that the States shall make regulations as to the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Representatives and Senators in Congress, it is simply a method agreed upon that the States shall make provision and not fail to elect their members of Congress, and that only when they fail to act or shall declare hostility to the Federal power shall Congress intervene.

It did not mean, moreover, that the States had no powers beyond controlling the times, places, and manner; for the States themselves, in their sovereign capacity, when they made the Federal Government, not only controlled the times, places, and manner, but controlled the very substance of the election and qualified the electors themselves who were to cast their votes at the election. This is shown by section 2 of Article I:

The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the Legislature.

And the subsequent provision in the Constitution that Congress shall have the right to make, alter, or amend these regulations does not mean that the Congress shall have the power to take control of the election, as is substantially proposed by this bill.

But this bill creates a great number of supervisors who are in the very nature of things ministerial officers of the court, but the bill in substance makes the supervisor a judicial officer, and provides that these officials shall pass upon the qualifications of the elector in the States who gets his right to vote from the State. The supervisor belies his title, for he counts the ballots and certifies the count, and makes judicial decision as to the eligibility of the voter, and the certificate of this ministerial officer of the Federal court is made by this bill to supersede in this House the decisions of the judicial election officers elected or appointed by the local authorities or the State, and even the executive power of the States themselves. As to the State board of Federal canvassers, can any lawyer contend that they come under the words "manner of holding elections?"

If the Supreme Court of the United States should uphold such a construction of the Constitution as that, I wish to say in all sincerity that it is time we examined for amendment this "charter of our liberties," in order to prevent the strangulation of the rights of the people of the United States by our judicial tribunals. [Applause.] I am debarred, however, by the limitation of time from discussing this serious constitutional objection to the bill.

Now what is this bill in substance? It takes substantially from the States the power to control their elections. It hands that power over to a few chief supervisors of elections, appointed for life, and over whom the people have no control. No one contemplated such power for these men, however fair and honorable or otherwise they may be, when they were appointed.

It puts in the background of those supervisors, to give them a seeming respectability and impartiality, the Federal judges of the circuit courts. The Federal judge is beckoned by this magnate, called the chief supervisor, to open his court, which in reality under this bill becomes a political headquarters, in order that he may go in and have his acts certified and indorsed by the Federal judge; but in reality, when you come down to it, this bill makes the chief supervisor of elections absolute, autocratic, and sovereign in his control of the election. Then it says to him, "You shall gather an army of supervisors, you shall recruit them," and the bill between the lines says, "You shall recruit them from one political party." The number of supervisors and marshals to be appointed far exceeds the number of electors required to petition to put this law in force. Therefore, every man who wants $5 a day has only to sign the call for Federal intervention—about $40 of a bribe for every signer.

There is of course a seeming show of fairness in saying that where there are three supervisors in a precinct one shall be of the opposite political party, but the bill says that when the chief supervisor of elections is satisfied that one of the supervisors is "not a good man," or, in the language of the bill, "whose integrity he shall have reason to doubt," he can remove him. There are some chiefs who would doubt under this "the integrity" of any Democrat. First you give him a blank recruiting warrant, and say to him, "Take the advice of your political friends, in the interest of your party; recruit this tremendous army of mercenary partisan spies; then, when you have got them, weed them out, and the court will certify to every man you suggest."

There you have got—what? You have got an army of supervisors, very much larger in numbers than all the enlisted men in the Army and Navy of the United States, allowing on an average 150 voting precincts to each Congressional district, and three supervisors and three marshals to each precinct, you get a grand total of 257,400, under the absolute control of the chief supervisors, beyond the power of the local and State authorities, weeded out, selected, culled, called in the bill "discreet," to watch the citizen of the United States, to hound, harass, and obstruct him, and to finally join in certifying to the Clerk of this House who shall sit in this Chamber as representatives of the people. When I read the provisions of this bill in the silence of my own chamber I said to myself, involuntarily, "Is this a misuse of oriental despotism or a proposition for the statute-books of a free people?" [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Read the bill, page 17, line 181, and answer me if that word "discreet" does not mean such a body of soulless, degraded sleuth-hounds, perjurers, and sneaks as passed for secret police and were used to prop up the falling fortunes of that wretched man, Napoleon III.

The Federal judge is dragged down from the bench of the courts, to which our people have been educated to look for the safety of their liberties, simply to back them up, as I said, with a show of impartiality and fairness by saying, "The judge of the United States circuit court, appointed for life, a gentleman of character, has indorsed the actions of the chief supervisor." The judges under this bill, if vile partisans at heart, will be more available, but, if honest men, will be unable to check his imperial highness the chief supervisor.

Mr. HERBERT. Let me suggest right there to my friend that under this bill the judges have no power to appoint any supervisor who is not recommended by the chief supervisor.

Mr. MCADOO. Certainly.

Mr. HERBERT. All power to do otherwise is taken away from him.

Mr. MCADOO. Now, in the brief time allowed me, I shall not be able to go over the provisions of the bill as I would like to, but I want to call the attention of the House to one feature which is worthy of consideration. It is eminently fitting that in the most strongly pronounced Hamiltonian measure which has been introduced in Congress since the beginning of the civil war the old leaven of know-nothingism should peep out in this Federal-Whiggery bill.

All the citizens of the United States are to be harassed and obstructed enough by this bill, but the foreign-born citizen has been especially singled out by provisions which look to so much annoyance, so much espionage, so much hounding by the hired spies of the Government, that he will be intimidated from casting a free ballot. Why, this bill provides that these chief supervisors, mere ministerial officers of the Federal court, shall go into the State tribunals and supervise there, in courts where they have no right nor business, the naturalization of foreign-born citizens. Why, it is a sham and a delusion to talk about State rights and State sovereignty and the liberties of citizens, or the equality of citizens foreign-born and native, when a mere satrap, a mere paid mercenary, at $5 a day, appointed by the Federal Government, appointed at second hand, can go into the State court and supervise the naturalization of the foreign-born citizen. Let the adopted citizens of this land who yield to none in devotion to American institutions, and among whom are not a few like myself whose kith and kin and may be immediate ancestors shed their blood to secure our liberties in Revolutionary days, and devoted their best years to making permanent the Republic, and who to-day, as in the past, would glory in dying for it, read the following paragraphs of the bill:

To make in any city or town having 20,000 inhabitants or upward, at any time between the Tuesday five weeks preceding the day of any election at which a Representative or Delegate in Congress is to be voted for and the day of election, a thorough and effective house-to-house canvass of the whole or any portion of any election district or voting precinct which they shall be directed by the chief supervisor of elections to visit and canvass; to ascertain by inquiry at any dwelling, building, or other place of abode in any such election district or voting precinct which they may be required to so canvass the name, age, nativity, term of residence in country, State, city, county, parish, district, or precinct, and other qualifications as a voter of every male person therein residing; to make full report, in writing, to the chief supervisor of elections of all answers and information obtained by them in response to their inquiries so made and upon the completion of their work to file their reports with said chief supervisor.

Twelfth. To make, in any city or town having 20,000 inhabitants or upward, when required by the chief supervisor, a list of all such persons as shall be naturalized in any court therein, the date of their naturalization, whether as a minor or otherwise, with the residence of such persons, their place of nativity, and the name and residence of their witness, and, for such purpose, shall have at all times access to and the right to examine the original affidavits or applications presented or which have been presented to said courts and there filed. Such lists so made shall be filed in the office of the chief supervisor.

Thirteenth. To inform all voters who may inquire of them in what box any of their ballots should properly be placed, and to prevent, as far as possible, the depositing of any ballot in the wrong box.

This thirteenth is a nice plan to scrutinize the ballot!

Fourteenth. To observe and scrutinize the manner in which naturalizations are being made and to aid the court in the matter of preventing fraudulent naturalizations, and for these purposes to have at all times free access to all rooms where such proceedings are being conducted.

The provisions of this subdivision to apply only to such discreet or special supervisors as shall, from time to time, be directed and detailed by the chief supervisor of elections for this particular duty, in cities or towns having 20,000 inhabitants and upward, save that when a chief supervisor of elections shall have reason to believe that actual fraud or perjury has been, is being, or is about to be committed in the matter of naturalization in any particular city, town, village, or other place having less than 20,000 inhabitants, he shall take measures to ascertain the facts and expose and prevent the same, and in so doing may detail such supervisors of election as he may select to aid him therein, and such supervisors shall have all the power and authority conferred upon supervisors in cities of 20,000 inhabitants and upward.

And it provides further, that in order to harass, obstruct, and annoy this man who has been naturalized, they shall make, five weeks preceding the election, a domiciliary visit to every house. And you will notice that this bill does not say they shall inquire of the man himself as to his age, nativity, when he was naturalized, etc., but they shall make inquiries in the dwelling. Why, the old English adage which our fathers brought over to this land, that a man's house is his castle, finds no place under this bill. The man's dwelling is to be invaded, his charter of citizenship, the most sacred thing in his eyes, is to be investigated by hearsay evidence of anybody in the dwelling. For this "discreet" spy is to go into the dwelling five weeks before the election and make inquiries of anybody.

It does not specify of whom he is to make inquiries, but he is to collect the neighborhood gossip, to invade the sanctity of the dwelling-place, to go to the house when the man is absent, to harass the women and the children and the people whom he may find there, to inquire as to when this man was naturalized, the validity of his papers, and the names of his witnesses who certified to his naturalization, when such witnesses may be dead. Take an unmarried naturalized workman in a large city, whose residence in a boarding-house changes, may be, frequently, to follow his work, or for any cause. And these Federal police would follow him up as if he were a criminal, covering him with suspicion in every house where he found a lodgment. And these men are to be continued in office for two months.

My friends, that is not an idle provision of this bill. They continue these men as officials for two months in order that by threatening and intimidating the voter in large cities when he is about to vote, and then by having over his head this standing army of spies, threatening to arrest him, he will never vote again in that city, or if he votes against them that the partisan grand jury provided for in this bill shall be made to promptly indict him. That is this meaning of it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, the whole thing proceeds upon the theory that there is absolute fraud in every naturalization; down in the heart of this bill is opposition to the naturalization laws. It proceeds upon the political theory that the adopted citizens of the United States are not voting the Republican ticket. That is the meat of this portion of the bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I say to gentlemen on the other side, to honest, fair-minded men on the other side, if you pass this measure you will not get the votes of a foreign-born citizen of the United States by any such drastic and revolutionary measure.

There is no danger signal certainly that you can fly in their face so repugnant to them as a strong centralized government. They themselves have come to this country as a people to escape from strong governments. They have felt the strong arm of the governments in Europe. They have been ground to the earth by governmental oppression; they dared a grave in the great waste of water to escape the tyranny of such codes and statutes. The adopted citizen took his family and household gods and came into a new land, severing ties that wrung his very heart; he has sworn allegiance to our flag and Constitution, has sworn to maintain for himself and all the inhabitants of this great and blessed land the fullest liberty which is guaranteed by the Constitution, to be of you, and with you, and for you to the death, and you meet him with a revolutionary, dangerous, and drastic measure, which could not be passed in a free parliament in Europe to-day. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Was it for this that Washington ennobled his services in the Revolutionary struggle, when his sword flashed from Lexington to Yorktown, and his principles were enunciated at Mecklenburg? Was it for this that the best blood of his heart made slippery the steeps of Fredericksburgh and Gettysburgh? No, no. I can not believe that you intend to pass such a bill as this in the American House of Representatives. It is a mad thought, born of the night, which will flee from you, I trust, in the sunlight of a fair discussion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. MCADOO. I would like two minutes more.

Mr. FLOWER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New Jersey may be allowed five minutes more.

Mr. BLAND. I ask unanimous consent that he be allowed to proceed without limit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks that the gentleman from New Jersey may be allowed to proceed without limit.

Mr. MILLIKEN. The time consumed to be taken out of the time allotted to that side.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from New Jersey only wants five minutes.

Mr. MCCREARY. The gentleman from New Jersey says he only desires five minutes. I ask unanimous consent that he be allowed five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request that the gentleman from New Jersey be allowed five minutes further time? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MCADOO. I thank the House very much, indeed, for its courtesy. There is a tinge of humor in this bill. Now, tragedies on the old stage were generally preceded by a bit of comedy. There is a tinge of humor in this bill in the heavy penalty it provides against the Clerk of this House if he shall not receive the certificates of the supervisors as against the certificates of the State authorities. The penitentiary yawns for him; a tremendous fine is imposed on him in case he fails to receive the certificates of a supervisor as against the action of the chief executive of a State.

It is a simple farce; it is meant to give an argument to a partisan Clerk who is to back up this conspiracy or to frighten an opposition Clerk into betraying his conscience. It is to make intact your conspiracy to control the members of this House; that your trembling Clerk here shall refuse to receive the certificate of the honest votes of the people to members who have the sovereign seal of state in their hands. Here stands your trembling Clerk receiving the certificates of the mercenary army of Federal police. When he feels the hot breath of the indignant and outraged American people against his face he points to this clause of the bill which says, "if you do not receive the certificates of the chief supervisor you will go to prison." He says: "I can not do that; I can not go to prison, and I will be fined $5,000." The idea of having this penalty against a partisan Clerk when he owes his place to his party! It was simply putting up a barricade against a whirlwind of indignation from the outraged people. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

My friends, the American people do not want a powerful government, and I say to my fair-minded friends on the other side of this Chamber that an imperial consolidation under such a bill as this is more dangerous than open revolution against our form of government. Our fathers had been used to contemplate, not the temple of liberty as a resplendent edifice under imperial protection, but the temples of liberty, in the town hall, the county court-house, and the State capitol, and scattered throughout our land as plentifully as the sacred edifices wherein men worship God. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.] These temples were to be guarded by the freemen of the vicinage, sovereign as against King, Parliament, or a Congressional oligarchy in the year 1890.

I ask my fair-minded friends on the other side to vote against this bill. I say to them, abandon this vicious measure. When the lascivious and selfish George II undertook to make himself absolute sovereign of Great Britain by an obnoxious bill for the collection of excise and personal taxes, the democracy of England rose en masse against it, and from one end of the country to the other there went a loud roar of indignation. Walpole, the prime minister, in the House of Commons treated this storm of discontent with profound contempt. Cool, collected, undaunted, and determined, he passed from the House after the first division on the bill, walled in by the royal troops and surrounded by colleagues, to save him from the surging masses of angry people who believed that he proposed to subject them to the inquisitorial domiciliary visits of government underlings to extort taxes on all they possessed to fill the coffers of an avaricious, base, and lustful monarch. Walpole, like some of our modern statesmen, having lost faith in the virtue of the people, doubted their courage, and at the next session continued to press the measure to a passage. "The noise of these sturdy beggars," he said, "can not shake me;" and the bill was passing slowly through its different stages, until finally the waters of indignation were let loose, and the hot, furious protest of English freemen from every quarter of the kingdom went up, until the angry waves of popular indignation lapped against the very doors of the Parliament house, and Walpole abandoned the bill, and to secure his own personal safety, not assured even by the presence of troops, disguised in an old cloak he fled from the Parliament of England, crying among the masses of people surrounding the House, "Liberty! Liberty! No excise bill!" [Loud applause.]

By the memory of our fathers; by their principles, their struggles, and their victories; in the name of that humanity who have sworn to have home rule everywhere; by your oath to the Constitution; by your desire for freedom; by your devotion to American liberty; by our common country basking this summer day in the sunshine of peace, fraternity, and prosperity; by your pride in the Commonwealths you represent; by your love of your own people; by your sense of manliness and fairness, I adjure, I beg of you abandon this measure by your votes. Go back with us to the people crying, "Liberty! Liberty! No invasion of the rights of the States; no destruction of local rule; no Federal returning boards; no domiciliary visits; no trampling upon the rights of freemen by an American Congressional oligarchy." [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. McCOMAS. Mr. Speaker, as I listen to the invective of gentlemen on the other side, it seems to me that they need to be reminded where we are and what we are.

Ours is a national Government, covering vast territory and 66,000,000 people, a Government which should be as dear to every American as his State government.

State rights should be respected, but the rights of the United States should be equally respected. We are elected to meet here as the representatives of the people of the United States, and not as delegates from each State. The fair election of each of these Representatives in Congress is of vital importance to all the people of the United States. The Government of the United States has at least as much interest in the conduct of these elections as have the State governments.

The Constitution gives power to Congress to regulate the elections whereon its existence depends, a power ample, important, fundamental. A power which in the light of a quarter of a century of experience with the intimidation and frauds practiced at such elections may be necessary to the existence of the National Government.

Let us consider in a spirit of national patriotism, freed from local jealousies, how Congress may safeguard these elections from bribery and corruption, from fraud and violence. Let us not forget that the interest and power of the nation are paramount in defending Congressional elections from intimidation and corruption. The Supreme Court, in the eloquent words of Justice Miller, admonishes us:

If the Government of the United States has within its constitutional domain no authority to provide against these evils; if the very source of power may be poisoned by corruption or controlled by violence and outrage without legal restraint, then indeed is the country in danger, and its best powers, its highest purposes, the hopes which it inspires, the love which enshrines it, are at the mercy of the combinations of those who respect no right but brute force on the one hand and unprincipled corruption on the other.

The government of the great cities under universal suffrage is the most serious problem of the North and West. The stream of immigration swells the vicious and criminal elements of their population. New York City in the days of Tweed, the corrupt elections of San Francisco and St. Louis in recent years, a repetition of fraudulent elections in Chicago and Baltimore prove that the mass of good citizens in our great cities forget their municipal obligations and surrender not only to local misgovernment, but at the same time surrender the machinery of national elections to corrupt control, to bribery and fraud.

Mr. BLAND. When the gentleman alludes to St. Louis, I wish to state that the Federal courts have jurisdiction of this subject there now, and they are controlled by your party, and you are responsible if frauds are not punished.

Mr. McCOMAS. We will do our duty under the existing law, and have already seen its good effects in punishing election frauds in St. Louis itself, and we will now extend and strengthen the law to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. BLAND. Yes, you want to make it possible for your party to commit all the frauds and never be prosecuted for them.

Mr. McCOMAS. We want to make it possible to punish all such rascality as St. Louis among other places may have already contributed to the annals of corruption and crime in elections.

Mr. BLAND. St. Louis can take care of itself.

Mr. McCOMAS. We want to help to take care of it when it tries by corrupt methods to control seats of Representatives upon this floor.

Mr. Speaker, the Legislatures of the North and West are struggling in every State to save the very States themselves from the corrupt elections in great cities. Shall the National Legislature, partaker in the resulting evils, take no part in the national movement for an honest ballot, an honest count, and an honest return of Congressional elections in the great centers of our suffrage?

But the national law for supervising Federal elections in cities of over 20,000 inhabitants has during nineteen years already done much, and an awakened moral sense will do more, to secure pure elections and the fair return of Representatives in Congress from the great cities of the white States.

This bill, extending and strengthening the national system of supervision of elections of Congressmen, may be more effective there than it can be in the old slave regions, where Congressional election frauds are flagrant and periodical in many States.

The election contests in this Congress locate the Southern evil, and throw a flood of light on its varied aspects.

This House seated the Representative from the Fourth district of West Virginia, Mr. SMITH, who was elected, but the governor of West Virginia shamelessly deprived him of his certificate by deciding that "two," part of the word twelve, as the figures on the returns before him made plain, was an abbreviation for two. Twelve elected him and two defeated him. We righted this wrong by a governor of a State. The Representative of the First district of West Virginia, Mr. ATKINSON, was by the same governor deprived of his certificate. He had a majority of the votes. His opponent demanded a recount. In Wetzel County the returns were held back, and in the court-house, by the assent or connivance of the custodian of the ballots, Mr. ATKINSON's name was scratched off of enough ballots to give Mr. Pendleton the certificate, but we restored to Mr. ATKINSON his seat.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia, rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PETERS). Does the gentleman from Maryland yield?

Mr. McCOMAS. For a moment.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I simply want to put it upon record that the gentleman's statement of the condition of affairs in the two districts of West Virginia which he has mentioned is his own statement, and is not accepted or agreed to on this side.

Mr. McCOMAS. My statement is the finding of the majority of this House.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. It is the finding of the Republican members of the Committee on Elections.

Mr. McCOMAS. It is the finding of the majority of the committee, based on the records of these election contests, and the evidence sustains it most fully and amply. I have not heard my friend from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] deny that the governor of his State did say that "two," part of the word twelve in figures before him, was a contraction of the word "two." That also is a part of the current history of this House, and I have not heard my eloquent friend venture to disclaim in support of that action of the governor or to deny the fact.

Mr. Speaker, in the Fifth district of Maryland Mr. MUDD was elected, but the certificate, contrary to the actual local district returns, was given to his opponent. Intimidation at the polls, bold and successful in one precinct of Anne Arundel County, largely reduced Mr. MUDD's majority.

In the Third district of Virginia Mr. WADDILL was elected, but at every precinct the judges of election were Democrats, and in large black precincts by indiscriminate challenging, by long questioning to make delay, a great mass of black Republican votes could not be polled. In the First district of Arkansas the conspiracy to defraud a candidate of the Wheelers' and Farmers' Alliances, Mr. FEATHERSTON, who had always been a Democrat, began the work in Crittenden County by driving out the county officials who were Republicans and could appoint the judges of election, and putting in their place pliant Democrats.

The famous ballot-box with the double slot was introduced here. Finally in the count the Democratic judges of the election in sundry precincts boldly reversed the returns and gave FEATHERSTON'S opponent the certificate; but the House righted this wrong. In the Fourth district of Alabama, Mr. McDUFFIE was given his seat. The judges of election were uniformly Democrats or often two Democrats and one colored man who could not read or write. Everybody was allowed to vote, but after the voting the counting was in the interest of the Democratic candidate, and often the poll-lists were stuffed with names to match the frauds. To prevent challengers outside the window from keeping the tally, intimidation was practiced. Two men were shot and one man was killed at this comparatively peaceful election.

The Committee on Elections have further reported that the contestant, Langston, is entitled to the seat as Representative from the Fourth district of Virginia and find that twice as many qualified voters cast their votes for Langston as were allowed him in the returns. In one precinct were returned 26 more ballots than voters. In several precincts the judges of election shut out the clerks from the room before the ballot-box was ready to receive the ballots of voters.

In the Seventh district of South Carolina the committee have also reported that the contestant, Miller, was elected. They find that frauds in registration were numerous, that many Republican voters were given no chance to register. In several precincts the count was glaringly false. The ballot-boxes of half a dozen precincts were stuffed. By shifting the ballot-boxes to deceive illiterate black voters, by the famous ballot-box system of South Carolina, devised to prevent the expression of the will of the voters under the constitution, 1,000 votes more were gained for the sitting member.

Says Hon. Henry Watterson, a distinguished ex-member of Congress, who writes national Democratic platforms:

I should be entitled to no respect or credit if I pretended that there is either a fair poll or count of the vast overflow of black votes in States where there is a negro majority, or that in the nature of things present there can be.

These are the fresh fruits of a policy of permanent domination of a "white man's party" over the other electors, black and white. This sentiment tends to destroy free government and local self-government in a State. There are other fruits of this one-party policy.

In North Carolina fourteen years ago to nullify the power of their adversaries in counties where they still held majorities this one-party power took away the power of self-government in the State and centralized it in the State Legislature.

In Maryland the scheme to rob Republican counties of local home rule has gradually centralized the power rightfully belonging to the people in the control of officials of the dominant Democratic party.

Democrats who talk about "the people" as the fountain of power, resting it with them and on their shoulders, I call your attention to this one of many instances where this power is being taken from the people. The control of the schools and the appointment of school officers was wrested from the people, where it had been for over a century, and placed in the hands of the judges of the courts. If there be one thing the people can do for themselves it is to select their own school teachers, to levy their own school rates, and by their trustees conduct their own public schools.

The registers of voters have always been appointed by the Democratic governor, and they, his partisans, have power to qualify or disqualify every voter in the State. The only escape was by an appeal to the courts; but the last Legislature have made the appeal of a citizen so difficult that we, the citizens of Maryland, hold our suffrage to-day at the mercy of one partisan of one party.

Mr. HOPKINS. Do I understand the gentleman to say that in Democratic Maryland the people do not have the privilege of electing their own school trustees?

Mr. MCCOMAS. They do not, sir. We have been robbed of it by this "people's" party, who would rob the people of the power of local self-government and home rule.

Public sentiment, goaded by a sense of frauds in elections, demanded an Australian ballot law. The last Democratic Legislature gave some sort of Australian ballot law, but deftly cheated the people by robbing the counties of their right of self-government, by robbing the people of the counties of the right to choose their own judges of election. Where is my eloquent friend from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO], who has just talked of that right of the people as an inherent personal right?

Mr. HERBERT. Will the gentleman permit me to say that this bill authorizes the sending of supervisors who are to be the judges of election from any one point in the district to another to be the judges of election in counties where they have never set foot before. Does the gentleman justify that on his plea of home rule?

Mr. MCCOMAS. I tell the gentleman that when the people at home are robbed of the right to judge of the election of their local officers, and that right is placed in the hands of a partisan governor, it is a good time for the Federal judiciary, non-partisan, holding their offices for life, to be possessed of the power under some law to put men to watch the actions of such partisan officials, and that they may not take away honesty in national elections when they take from the people the power of local home rule as has been done in Maryland. [Applause on Republican side.]

Mr. HERBERT. But the judge can appoint no supervisor under this bill who has not been recommended by the chief supervisor. That chief supervisor is himself a partisan, and he has authority under this bill to send local supervisors into distant counties to control the elections—counties where they have probably never set foot before. Now, is there anything like that in Maryland?

Mr. MCCOMAS. Why, it is far worse than that in Maryland. This supervisor can not affect their State elections. In Maryland the power is taken from them to judge of their local election officials, which they have enjoyed since the year of the national declaration of independence.

Mr. HERBERT. And this bill takes it away from them.

Mr. MCCOMAS. This bill does not touch the State elections. This deprivation of the liberties of the people of their essential rights is more monstrous than any declamation that he can make against the provisions of the pending bill. This bill recognizes the right of the people to determine their local affairs. That right is taken from the people of Maryland, the right to supervise the election of their county commissioners, carrying with it the control of the public roads and bridges, the assessment of local taxes, the levies for school purposes. They are further robbed of the right to supervise the control of the election of judges of the probate courts, the men who care for the estates of the people, the interests of the widows and orphans of Maryland, as well as the election of their prosecuting attorneys and the discharge of the duties imposed upon them of maintaining the public peace in the counties, and along with it the election of sheriffs in the counties of Maryland. This power is transferred from the people, who have never abused it, and centralized in the hands of the governor at Annapolis, who will now be the head of a State supervisor system which will soon breed corruption worse than ever before.

Mr. HERBERT. But the gentleman from Maryland has not answered the question I asked him. Does the Maryland law authorize the sending of the judge of election from one county into another to supervise the election, as this bill does?

Mr. MCCOMAS. Why, have I not just shown you that it does ten times worse?

Mr. HERBERT. But does it do that? Is there any case under the law of Maryland in which the judge of election can be sent from one county into another to judge of an election in a distant county where he never set foot before? I would like to have the gentleman answer "yes" or "no."

Mr. MCCOMAS. And I have told you it does much worse than that; and what confidence can a Democrat have in rising on this floor in his place, in a national Congress, to complain that we in Congress guard our right to national self-government in the very year when I recount to him how the people of Maryland have had taken away from them the right of local self-government in the supervision of local elections in their local affairs, which they have held unquestioned since the very foundation of the Government?

I am just informed by my friend from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] that in South Carolina they have, under the State law, a right to send inspectors or supervisors from precinct to precinct; and I commend to my friend from Alabama to study the South Carolina law with its peripatetic inspectors.

Mr. HERBERT. But will the gentleman not admit that it is proposed to do much worse by this bill, where you propose to send an officer from county to county?

Mr. HOPKINS. This bill simply follows Democratic precedents.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I have not heard my friend from Alabama utter any condemnation of the deprivation of the people of North and South Carolina and of Maryland, or of other States, of the right to home rule. He is silent, and all of you are silent, when the people are robbed of the very life of home rule.

In Virginia the system of elections has been recently centralized, apparently to encourage corrupt officials to make corrupt election returns. The State canvassing board consists of five members, all Democrats. The one hundred and twelve electoral boards of the counties and cities are all Democrats, named in a Democratic caucus and elected by one ballot in a secret caucus by a resolution of the Legislature. These men appoint all the registers and judges of elections, and are all the creatures of a partisan Democratic legislative caucus.

Think of it! The people have no voice in the selection of those who record their will. And then you say of this as a contrast, "How bad is the supervisors' system." In answer to that I will read for the benefit of the gentleman from Alabama the testimony of Hon. William C. Whitney before the Cox investigating committee in 1877. I will show you what good came from a supervisor going about from election ward to election ward to watch a Democratic election in New York City. Hear him:

Q. Do you believe that there was any fraudulent or illegal registration?

A. I do not imagine that there was any worth speaking of. There is, of course, an uncertain element in this registration, but Mr. Davenport takes that, and goes throughout the city and ascertains whether it is legal or illegal. He has a large force employed in that duty, and he has the material with which to do it effectually, because he has done it for a number of years previously, and he has the city all indexed, and when he starts out he knows who used to live in every house. He has got all those facts on his books; in fact, the whole city is spread out before him as if it were on a map, and he is able to eliminate the cases where a man has registered for the first time from a given house within the last year or two years, which are cases where fraud, if there be any, is most probable. After he has gone through the list he finds, perhaps, two or three thousand people who possibly may have fraudulently registered. The uncertain element in regard to that two or three thousand is this: Perhaps out of that two thousand there are not more than two hundred and fifty persons who come to the polls and whose cases are investigated. The other seventeen hundred and fifty cases may or may not be fraudulent. Aside from the element that keeps away from the polls, I think that the election is as honest as we can get it.

Q. The list is corrected and revised and purged before the election?

A. Yes, sir. Mr. Davenport will explain to you how carefully he goes over the registry. I am entirely familiar with the system that he has put in operation, and I think it is very thorough, and if a man succeeds in getting through that system and voting when he has no title to vote he is pretty smart.

Q. You think that the supervision of the election under the system of Mr. Davenport has had the tendency to prevent illegal voting and to give a fair election?

A. I think it has—yes, sir. . . . I know that I have heard Mr. John Kelly since [the election] express to the organization with which he is connected, and in one place and another, the same opinion I have expressed here—that Mr. Davenport has been a very important accessory in preventing fraudulent voting in New York City.

Sir, the complaint seems to have been that this supervisor went from place to place, but he found out the evil and the fraud and the wrong; and that distinguished Democrat seems to have approved his going about from place to place, and finds that he has purged the lists, has promoted justice, advanced the purity of elections, and commends him for it, and says that John Kelly, the chief of Tammany, did the same thing.

Mr. HERBERT. Those supervisors were supervisors merely and never did more, but the supervisors under this bill have the power to receive the votes, to count them, and they are judges of election, and they are the officers who are to be sent under this bill from one county to another, into the most remote parts of a Congressional district.

Mr. McCOMAS. If the gentleman will read the law he will find that the old supervisors and these supervisors have the same power of counting the votes.

Mr. HERBERT. The old supervisors had no power to make returns at all.

Mr. McCOMAS. They had the power to count the votes.

Mr. HERBERT. Simply to supervise, that is all.

Mr. McCOMAS. The gentleman must be accurate. He stated that these supervisors will have the power to count the votes. I say the old supervisors had the same power to count the votes.

Mr. HERBERT. But these supervisors under this bill will have the power to make the returns upon which the certificates are made, and this bill provides that they may be sent from one part of the district to another, however remote.

Mr. McCOMAS. And that I will discuss later on, and if the gentleman will give me his attention I will show that it does not deprive the State of any State right or power with respect to those elections. But I do not care just now to be diverted from the course of my remarks.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, will it interrupt the gentleman too much if I ask him a question?

Mr. McCOMAS. I yield for a moment only.

Mr. TILLMAN. I understood the gentleman to say just now, perhaps on the authority of some other person, that in the State of South Carolina supervisors of election are sent from one county to another, or from one precinct to another.

Mr. McCOMAS. I have been so informed.

Mr. TILLMAN. I beg him to give his authority for that assertion. Let him point out the law; for I never heard of any such thing.

Mr. McCOMAS. I will endeavor to look into it.

Mr. ROWELL. I will state the fact that in the Seventh district of South Carolina, at the last Congressional election, the precinct inspectors of one precinct came from another Congressional district and held the precinct election.

Mr. TILLMAN. By what authority; where is the law?

Mr. ROWELL. They did it; and they were Democrats, every one.

Mr. TILLMAN. Where is the law?

Mr. McCOMAS. It seems to have been a fact.

Mr. TILLMAN. Vouched perhaps by perjured testimony. I am sorry the gentleman can not point out the law.

Mr. McCOMAS. All the Democrats of South Carolina are not like my distinguished friend. When an election is to be carried all of them do not inquire "Where is the law?" but they only search to find out where they can get the results. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not like to hear my State slandered and the existence of laws alleged to be of force there that are not of force and never have been of force and never will be, with our consent.

Mr. McCOMAS. I will say to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] that I have read that "eight ballot-box" law, and read the testimony in the case of Smalls vs. Elliott, in the last Congress. I think that some of the men who have assembled in the State Legislature of South Carolina have so foully slandered his State by such an act and calling it a law that all his eloquence can not wipe it out.

Mr. TILLMAN. Sir, the eight ballot-box law which you criticize so severely was the election law of South Carolina from shortly after the Revolutionary war down to the civil war, and we merely re-enacted it since the Democrats recovered control of the State.

Mr. McCOMAS. So much more the shame and pity of it. So much more the reason that for twenty-five years there has been no progress from the patriarchal, patrician, plantation government, in the direction of the interests of the rights of all the people.

Mr. TILLMAN. Sir, that law was simply a practical educational qualification of suffrage and nothing more. Besides our Federal elections are held separately and apart from State elections, so that we have but one Federal box on off year, and but two Federal boxes a Presidential year. Hence, there is no excuse for this bill as far as South Carolina is concerned.

Mr. McCOMAS. I am glad to see that many of the good citizens of South Carolina are restive under such a law, among them a distinguished gentleman bearing the same name as the gentleman from South Carolina. I am glad to see that they are in upheaval and uprising against the oligarchy that has so long controlled and perpetuated some of the worst laws on the statute-book and a minority rule in that State.

Mr. TILLMAN. If that be true, why do you seek to bind our decent white people together by chains, or rather why do you propose to pin us together with bayonets, as in this bill?

Mr. McCOMAS. I say that there is no bayonet in this bill. It upholds simply the power and dignity of the courts, trial by jury, the majesty of the law, and the Constitution of the country.

Mr. TILLMAN. You simply propose to put the judiciary above the legislative authority of the Government, which is in violation of every principle of civil and constitutional liberty that prevails wherever the English language is spoken. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. McCOMAS. I can not yield for a speech; but in answer to my friend I will say when legislative power takes from the people the inherent power of local control and self-government, it is time to invoke some power under the Constitution of the country that may stand between the machinations of partisan legislators and of a partisan and violent oligarchy and the rights of the plain, humble people, the people whom Lincoln loved, and fairness and justice to these demands and the Constitution requires that they should be protected.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is, you propose to take the power from the people and put it in the hands of one man, a judge, who ought never to have power to exercise control over an election.

Mr. McCOMAS. I can not yield to the gentleman for a speech. I yielded to him for a question.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask the gentleman to give me a moment more in order that I may say to those gentlemen who are about to inaugurate this most revolutionary measure—

Mr. McCOMAS. I can not yield longer to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. I tell the gentleman to lay no such flattering unction to his soul as that the present local agitation among Democrats in South Carolina will affect the result there so as permanently to injure the Democratic party, especially as long as the Republican party shall pass or attempt to pass such bills as this.

Mr. McCOMAS. I have not time to yield further to the gentleman from South Carolina. Nothing but the strong hand of a centralized power will overcome the abuses in not permitting the honest people of a State to have their voice expressed. I have not laid such flattering unction to my soul at any time as that the farmers of South Carolina can unhorse that oligarchy.

Mr. TILLMAN. Nearly every decent white man in South Carolina is a Democrat and will so remain till you cease trying to put white men under negroes. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. McCOMAS. If he were not, you would drive him out. I have not further time to yield.

I will not weary you by recounting the other old slave States which have taken home rule away from the people to secure a pure white man's government and exclude the blacks. While the National Government has been sitting idly by, all over the South has occurred a reactionary movement toward the medieval restrictions of slavery. By "the South" I mean every State wherein until the war slavery poisoned its institutions and generations yet living grew up within its leprous contact.

Fourteen years of white supremacy in these States with the white man's party in full control have passed, and these State governments are as far from pure government as when they began.

This exclusion of the blacks has entrenched corruption everywhere when in power. And one of the ways by which this people's movement will be overcome in the South and will have to give way to fraud and corruption there is, they will say, "You must endure all these ills, for lo, there may come a black man's supremacy, and all these efforts by the white population is oppressive to all laboring men, white or black."

When free government was sacrificed to get pure pure government by the whites the policy of repression of the black man led to oppression of all laboring men, white and black, to a crop lien system for landholders and merchants, the "anaconda mortgages" on the toil of tenant farmers, to the convict lease system, at war with healthy labor.

Within a short period the treasuries of half of the States of the South have been plundered by defaulting State treasurers—by Vincent, of Alabama; by Polk, of Tennessee; by Tate, of Kentucky; by Burke, of Louisiana; by Nolan, of Missouri; by Hemmingway, of Mississippi, just convicted; and by Archer, of Maryland.

Mr. McMILLIN. Why did you not include Howgate?

Mr. MCCOMAS. Was he a State treasurer?

Mr. McMILLIN. No; but he was a Government official.

A MEMBER. And Silcott.

Mr. MCCOMAS. The gentleman had forgotten Silcott. He was not a State treasurer, but our Democratic treasurer in this House.

You may compare the corruption of the carpet-bag governments, when the blacks were in the thick gloom of ignorant citizenship; when the recklessness and adventure which follows in the track of war bred corruption; when the intelligence of the South bitterly fought all governments and helped none—you may compare those feverish governments, built on the hot embers of reconstruction, with the appalling defalcations of the treasuries of so many States upholding the government of the white man's party unobstructed during fourteen of the best of years of peace and good-will.

Which of them is the more disheartening failure? Surely, the failure of the white man's party government is abject. Minority rule is corrupt rule. "Letting politics alone" degrades the subjugated mass in the South and corrupts the ruler. Suspension of citizenship makes this black mass serfs, not freemen. But the upper strata are degraded, too, constrained to vote for bad men rather than imperil the white man's party. The white youth are taught to give up truth and right for this policy, to wink at violations of law in order to uphold white domination. We have been told on this floor that the lower black mass does not care anything about government. But they have gained $150,000,000 worth of property. One million of their children are enrolled in colored schools; still another million of their children of school age are knocking at school doors wherein there is no room for them. Crops raised by their labor in 1889 reached $900,000,000 in value. Thousands of them have risked their lives to vote. So familiar is their ardor to cast a ballot that shotguns and cannon resound on election mornings more than once to affright them from the polls.

They were born Americans, they will live Americans, they will die Americans. It is not a supervisors' law, but the enfranchisement of these black Americans that holds the South united and compact.

It is this claim to civil and political rights, the full measure where-with the Constitution clothes them, which is resisted at the Southern ballot-box. Therefore it is not only the ballot of the negro which is not counted, but also the ballot of the white man whose creed is that the negro's ballot should be counted.

These things have turned the tide of immigration from the South.

You may speak of Birmingham, Anniston, Roanoke, and Chattanooga. I rejoice with you in this new South of coal and iron, of cotton mills and railways. I welcome the tidings of each new furnace and factory and town, the coming of Northern capital and Western booms.

But I grieve that only 15 per cent. of the lands of the South are cultivated; that fewer and fewer northern-born white men go South, where the green and tender bosom of the virgin earth, fruitful with myriad golden harvests unborn, welcomes and requites toil, where the frosts do not blight, where the winds are never fierce, where the waters love to flow in broad rivers, where forests are measureless by man, where the skies are always kind. I am sorrowfully convinced that it is a love of a broader freedom that induces the American farmer to carry his sons to trench and irrigate the parched desert, to face cyclones, brave arctic weather, to dwell under wintry skies, rather than populate our favored land, where the dignity of labor is dishonored by the repression of eight millions of laboring people, haply because they are black.

The American-born immigrant carries freedom of thought and action, carries citizenship and sovereignty with him wherever he goes. The land that allures him to abide in it must secure him in the exercise of these rights.

It is the white man's government of the South that repel the vigorous youth of the North. Many of the best men of the South are convinced of their failure, the indifferent millions of the North and West begin to be dimly conscious that by the supremacy of the white man's party in the black States the nation is unduly controlled. The tide of race prejudice overflows the borders of the black States. Its waves reach this capital and rise higher to yonder Speaker's chair. The triumph of white minority rule in the black States is the suppression of majority rule in the national House of Representatives. The Southern white Democracy counts the black man decisively in 40 representative votes on this floor.

"That a government whose most numerous and powerful branch of the Legislature is elected by the people directly has no power by appropriate laws to secure this election" from such fraudulent control "is a proposition so startling as to arrest attention."

This bill only proposes to supervise in part the election of Representatives.

The certificate of such an election is the apex of a pyramid. Its base is on the shoulders of the voters of a Congressional district. The certificate depends on the correct canvass of the returns; correct returns depend on the count of the ballots at an election whereat votes are fairly cast free from bribery and intimidations. The election after all depends on the registration, where registration is required. The registry must include all qualified and exclude all disqualified citizens, else it predetermines the election even though the registry be fair and full; the result finally depends on the Congressional district which may be distorted in population and territory to stifle the fair expression of the people's will.

The bill now proposed does not effectually supervise the registration; it does embrace the balloting, the canvass, the return, and the certificate.

The State officials register the voters, conduct the election, receive and count the ballots, make returns, and certify the Representative-elect. The Federal supervisor does not interfere with the State machinery nor trespass on the count of the votes for candidates for State or local offices. The Federal supervisors only duplicate the count of the State election officers when counting votes for Representatives in Congress. This double count and this double certificate tends to defeat fraud. This added publicity gives confidence in the result and will decrease contests for seats in this House.

This double canvass and certification will secure confidence in the expression of the people's will in districts where the elections are of bad repute. If the State certificate and the national canvassing board's certificates differ, it is necessary, logical, and constitutional that the national certificate should prevail. If they agree, the title of the Representative is surely unclouded. This extension of an old law can not defeat justice; it may secure it.

The responsibility of suffrage in the United States is so high, whether performed by white or black, that it may well be jealously guarded by the State and nation. This Federal supervisor system is lodged in non-partisan hands. The Federal judges have earned the general confidence of the whole people.

Mr. PEEL. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MCCOMAS. If it is on this point.

Mr. PEEL. I want to ask the gentleman one question. I put it to him in all candor and I ask him to give me a frank answer. If the circuit judges of this country were all Democrats instead of Republicans would the gentleman vote for this bill?

Mr. MCCOMAS. I would dishonor myself if I did not vote for this bill with honest judges on the Federal bench, of high character and good record, without regard to politics. If I did not, I should feel that I was not a patriot, or a lover of my country or of honest elections. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The circuit courts, some of whose judges are Democrats, the circuit courts next in rank to the Supreme Court itself, are the fountain of this power. These judges hold office for life and have no human temptation to appoint any but fair and honest supervisors.

The expense of this system has been grossly exaggerated in this debate. The system is optional with the people of each district. It may be conceded that if each of the 330 districts demanded it the expense would be five millions or ten millions; but if only one-fifth of the districts apply it every two years the outlay would not exceed a million dollars annually; and a free people will not too closely count the cost of an election if it be pure. This supervisors' system has stood the test of twenty years. Honest Democrats have more than once looked to it with satisfaction and hope of relief from fraudulent State machinery.

The extension of this system now proposed if adopted will gradually gain the public confidence. It awakes, as I said before, no fears of blue uniforms and gleaming bayonets at the polls.

It appeals for support to an awakened public conscience demanding fair elections. It appeals to public opinion to judge it by its results. It rests on the power of the courts of law and juries of the people. Against tissue ballots, against false counts, against ballot-boxes with false slots, against night-riders and the shotgun policy, against intimidation and assassination, we array the dignity of the courts, the majesty of the law and the power of the Constitution to assure justice and the full measure of political justice to all men, white and black. [Prolonged applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman has any time left I wish to ask him whether he thinks it is in the interest of honest elections to allow one political party to appoint an unlimited number of its own agents to supervise those elections.

Mr. MCCOMAS. This bill effectually and carefully provides for men of opposite politics, and avoids the evil which exists in the State governments where Democrats at the head and Democrats at the bottom control the election entirely for partisan purposes.

Mr. SPRINGER. I speak of the deputy marshals. There is no limit in the bill to the number of them that may be appointed.

Mr. MCCOMAS. The United States courts appoint the supervisors. This is a supervisor system, and not a marshal system. And I will say to my friend that while he is so earnest and strenuous in talking about these matters, it would be very refreshing to hear him or some other distinguished Democrat on this floor express a single aspiration for some method whereby the suppressed ballot of a whole race should be received and counted fairly. My friend declaims against this bill and against "Federal interference" because he professes to fear that it will work injustice to a particular party; but if he could only combine with his speeches upon that subject the expression of some aspiration for human rights and that fair play which the white race, to which he and I both belong, really loves, it would adorn his speeches and dignify his opposition to this bill. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I will tell the gentleman where my remedy for fraud is. It is with the people who hold the elections; and if you can not find it there, then self-government is a failure.

Mr. MCOMAS. The gentleman says his remedy is with the people who hold the elections. My remedy is, under God, in the love of human justice, with the people who have the power to control their elections in State affairs to make them pure by State machinery, and as to the election of national Representatives, by Congressional power exercised for purity in the election of Representatives upon this floor.

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman from Maryland is a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MCOMAS. I am not.

Mr. BLAND. You were some time ago.

Mr. MCOMAS. Six years ago.

Mr. BLAND. Why did not you report a bill to give the ballot to the colored people of this District?

Mr. MCOMAS. Why did not the gentleman introduce such a bill and put it before the committee that he might have reported when his party was in power?

Mr. BLAND. Your party took the ballot away from the colored people of this District and put them under the ban of Federal legislation, and you know that you are insincere in your professions of a desire to secure them the ballot.

Mr. MCOMAS. I can not yield for a speech, but I will reply to the gentleman from Missouri. When he stands up on this floor and affects an interest in the right of suffrage for 8,000 black voters in this District, dedicated to the National Government as its seat and under its control, when he affects an anxiety about the suffrage of these people, when I remember that during his service in this body, which has been twice as long as mine, he has never raised his voice in behalf of the poor oppressed black men of the South, and when he now passes by over eight millions of black people in this country, who are oppressed and whose ballots are suppressed, and begins to talk about the eight thousand colored people in this District treated as the whites have been, I say to him in the language of Scripture: "Thou hypocrite, cast out first the beam out of thine own eye, and then shalt thou see clearly to pull out the mote that is in thy brother's eye." [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BLAND. It is the beam in your hypocritical eye that I am after. The question is not about my record, but about your hypocrisy, and I denounce you all as hypocrites. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MCOMAS. I, too, will do some denouncing, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. BLAND. It is your hypocrisy I am after. My record has nothing to do with it, but your party is an organized hypocrisy; and there are some of the colored people in the gallery looking down upon you now from whom you took away the ballot. [Derisive laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MCOMAS. I will make further answer; and I will denounce your own unfairness, because—

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MCOMAS. No, sir; I have two minutes yet. I want to take one minute to answer the gentleman from Missouri in my own time. I want to say to him that here in this District the white and the black men are treated alike. I denounce you and those like you, because in the Southern States you do not treat the black men and the white men alike. [Cries of "That's it!" and applause on the Republican side and in the galleries.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PETERS). The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLAND. In reply to the gentleman from Maryland— [Cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky has risen to a question of order, and will state it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Yesterday afternoon the Speaker gave fair notice that if the disgraceful proceedings which had marked the conduct of a portion of the gallery should be repeated he would order the galleries cleared. I think the time has come when either the House should be free from the clamor in the galleries, or the Speaker should take such steps as will prevent the repetition of it.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I agree with the gentleman from Kentucky; but I am sorry the galleries find their example in the House.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I will not answer that remark of the gentleman from Maine, because I do not desire to seem to censure any of my colleagues on the floor. That is a question I leave to the gentleman from Maine. But I think all of us may unite in desiring that our proceedings here shall be free from interruption by the clamors of the galleries.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. May I be allowed one inquiry?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state, in reply to the point of order of the gentleman from Kentucky, that the galleries should not be allowed to applaud or to give expression to any sentiment with reference to the proceedings in the House; and such expressions must cease entirely. Persons occupying the galleries are there by the courtesy of the House, and they must remember where they are.

Mr. DOCKERY. The Chair is right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires further to say that it will greatly facilitate the maintenance of order in the House if gentlemen who desire to ask questions will first address the Speaker and through him secure permission from the member on the floor. It is impossible for the Chair to preserve order unless this rule is observed.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the Chair allow me one remark? [Cries of "Regular order."] The regular order is called for.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, John Wilcox, a renowned Republican statesman of California, once said, "The time has come when I feel that my duty to the people requires me to rise above principle for the benefit of my party." This sentiment seems to be the underlying principle in this bill.

Popular government is certainly impossible without local rule. Home rule is the tap-root of our political system. Upon it the Republic has grown. Take it away and you sap the system. You imperil its life. Tyranny gets its first foothold when this principle is interfered with. Interference with it is justified only in extreme cases and where it fails to operate. Even then it is doubtful whether the evils which spring from interference are not greater than those it seeks to correct. The struggle for free government has been a long one, and free government means local rule. Those who undertake to patch what they are pleased to call its defects assume a terrible responsibility. They open a gateway through which the evils of misgovernment may march in squadrons.

In times of great party excitement the temptation to do something to maintain party supremacy is very great. It requires the coolest judgment and the most supreme philosophy to resist the impulse. Those who have resisted it in times past have almost uniformly proved themselves public benefactors. It is easy to go with the current, but sometimes you must stem it to escape the rapids and the fearful plunge of the cataract.

No man can admire more than I the ability of the author of this bill. While his views are always very positive, his expressions are almost uniformly temperate. I have never before known him to fail to give some sound philosophical reason for his legislative action—something universally applicable to all times and all places. No man can regret more than I his descent from this high plane of statesmanship. Yet it is plain to me that in this instance he has done so. He does not pretend that there is a necessity for this measure in his own district or in his own section; yet nowhere does political excitement run higher, and nowhere in the Union is it liable to employ more exceptional methods.

What would be said if some member arose here and declared that the artisans of Lynn and the scholars of Cambridge and of Boston required primary Federal judicial supervision? We can easily fancy with what derision a proposition to appoint a committee to draught a bill for such a purpose would be received. But why not for Massachusetts as well as for South Carolina and Georgia? All three were of the old original Thirteen. Is not the representation from South Carolina and Georgia as good as that from Massachusetts? Are not the Representatives as freely sent and as ready to act in the one case as in the other?

The Speaker of this House, sometime before the adoption of the present infamous rules, assumed to determine the motives of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] in making a motion. Is Massachusetts to determine the motives of Georgia in sending her delegation to this House? In times past Massachusetts has been charged with political wrongs and political crimes in comparison with which those now charged as the basis of this bill are almost virtues. When George S. Boutwell was first a candidate for governor of that State the manufacturers of Lowell placarded the doors of their factories with a notice to the effect that those of their workmen found voting the Democratic ticket would be discharged.

This notice was to white men. No alleged shotgun policy, no tissue ballots, no false returning boards, ever showed such craft or insouciance. Yet Massachusetts has cured herself, and without the aid of a Federal election law. Who does not believe that such a law would have stimulated and have prolonged the disease instead of curing it? Massachusetts has had many revolutions in moral and political sentiment, and it is gratifying to say that they have usually improved her appearance. Imagine, if you can, the amazing change that occurred between the time when rum and negroes were twin commercial articles with her, and the time when she sent her first colored regiment to the war of the rebellion as equal citizens and soldiers. And this she accomplished herself, without Federal interference of any kind.

Her improvement is indeed wonderful. Go down to Salem and search the records. You will find there an original warrant for the execution of a woman convicted of witchcraft. More than this, Sheriff Corwin's return is indorsed thereon, announcing that the sentence was carried into effect. Nothing so abominable has been alleged against the section at which this bill is aimed. Yet Massachusetts has cured herself, and these things are now as abhorrent to her sons as they are to the rest of mankind.

The charges upon which this bill is founded are denied upon authority at least as respectable as that from which they come. Nobody denies what occurred in Massachusetts. But admitting, for the sake of argument, that the charges against the South are all true, is she not as capable of self-cure as Massachusetts? Our national prosperity proves that the State and the nation are in perfect health. Then why apply this red-hot iron to reopen a cicatrized sore?

This bill is entitled "A bill to amend and supplement the election laws of the United States and to provide for the more efficient enforcement of such laws, and for other purposes." It ought to be entitled "A bill to perpetuate negro supremacy and the domination of the Republican party in the House of Representatives." We virtually have negro supremacy now. The pivotal States voting for Harrison were carried by a solid negro vote. The Republican party rode into power with them and hitched them outside. And there they are today, championing their bits, stamping their feet, and switching their tails; without hay, without oats, without even water.

Talk about frauds in elections. Republicanism has long been a synonym of fraud. Its record in Louisiana, Florida, and South Carolina in 1876 was a record of fraud. Its record in Montana last year was one of fraud. Its record in this House is a record of fraud. To accomplish its aims and purposes it has recently turned out among others a Democratic Representative from his seat who came here backed by over 13,000 majority. It was done without a particle of evidence that would prevail in any other tribunal. The same body that perpetrated this outrage at the wink of party necessity now proposes to enact this bill into a law with the votes thus stolen. "Surely," in the language of John Wilcox, "they feel that their duty to the people requires them to rise above principle for the benefit of their party."

The bill bears the imprint of fraud. It is sprung upon the House at a moment's notice. It is being driven through it with whip and spur.

Look at it! Seventy-three pages of print—17,034 words—exactly 13,000 more than in the Constitution of the United States. Months were used in the discussion of that measure, and years elapsed before it became a binding instrument upon all the States. This measure, contradicting the entire spirit of the Constitution, and nearly five times as long and far more abstruse in terms, is to be rushed through this House within six days, with the power of substitution confined to its author alone.

The people are to be gyved before breakfast, before they are fairly awake to the enormity of the crime about to be perpetrated. There is no pretense that a majority of them would sanction the enactment of such a law. If it could be submitted to a popular vote it would be sent to perdition, where it belongs, by an overwhelming majority. Not a State in the Union would tolerate it. It is a desecration of the structure framed to protect individual, municipal, and State rights. Yet the strong hand of the Speaker of the House is evoked to squeeze from the Constitution the alleged power to enact it into a law; and this within a few hours after its birth. Why, the ink with which the bill is printed is hardly dry; the dampness has scarcely left the paper. It was launched upon the world with such haste that the report of the minority is not even bound with that of the majority. The majority report was given out only three days and the minority report only one day before the bill was taken up. The people know nothing of its details. Only a single copy of the measure has been allowed to each Representative.

I venture the assertion that no member of Congress who faithfully performs his duties toward his constituents has had time to read it; he certainly has not had time to either digest it or give it even superficial consideration. It is doubtful whether a tenth of the members of this House have carefully read the bill; yet they are forced to a vote upon it with hardly time to enter a protest.

The measures taken to drive it through the House are fully as infamous as the bill itself. They, like the bill, are dictated by party exigencies alone.

There is no sincerity in the measure. The Speaker himself admits it in an article written for the North American Review of June. Now there is no cant or humbug about the Speaker of this House. He has the nerve—if not the cruelty—of Oliver Cromwell. He "talks right out in meeting," and with a rich nasal twang. Like his friend John Wilcox, he evidently "feels that his duty to the people requires him to rise above principle for the benefit of his party."

In the Review he speaks in no uncertain tone. He assumes as an admitted fact that the negro vote of the South is suppressed by intimidation. To this, so far as the States are concerned, he offers no objection, but seems to suggest that it is highly proper. He sees no reason why the barbarians, alleged to be driven from the State ballot-box in the interest of civilization, may not be freely admitted to the national ballot-box in the interest of Republican domination in this House. He consents that the negro shall have no share in the control of his own home government, but asserts the right of the Republican party to have his vote counted in its favor at Congressional elections. He tolerates negro proscription for State purposes and denies it when the domination of his party is at stake in the House.

This is politics on the color line pure and simple. Could the illustrious John Wilcox himself ask for more than this?

The Speaker's line of argument is so ably answered by another Republican who disagrees with the doctrine, that I can not forbear incorporating it into my speech. It is from the columns of the Sun, from a Republican who sustained all the reconstruction measures:

[From the Sun of June 15, 1890.]

SPEAKER REED AS A PACIFICATOR—HIS PLAN FOR UNITING THE SOUTHERN DEMOCRATS AND NORTHERN REPUBLICANS.

WASHINGTON, June 15.

There is no cant or humbug about Hon. THOMAS R. REED, of Maine, Speaker of the House of Representatives. To borrow a phrase from the Down-easters he so well represents, he "speaks right out in meeting" whenever he has anything to say. No one will deny this after reading his article in the North American Review for June on "The Federal Control of Elections." Mr. REED is a shining light in his party, and is perhaps as largely interested in its continued ascendancy as any man in the land. He is from a State which has furnished a candidate for the Republican Presidential nomination in every national convention of that party since and including that of 1876, and is himself regarded by men of all parties as a sound and first-class piece of Presidential timber. As the sunset of political life gives mystical lore to the Sage of Augusta it is probable that he sees the portly form of his successor in the Speaker's chair, like a coming event, casting its shadow before, and hears the gleeful shouts of thousands of throats as the chairman of the next Republican convention announces that THOMAS R. REED, of Maine, is its candidate.

Of course, Mr. REED understands the importance to him of remaining in his present post of influence and power for another term. Hence his anxiety to secure a Republican majority in the next House of Representatives. He sees before him every day the very narrow Republican majority in the present House and realizes that even for this his party is greatly indebted to the tariff letter of Grover Cleveland and to the rub-a-dub enthusiasm incidental to Presidential campaigns only. With the able national committee resting from its labors and frying no fat, and with a Congressional committee, the chairman and secretary of which have quarreled and separated over the cost of a few chairs and tables for which the chairman says it can not pay, the outlook would be dismal indeed if there were no new political fields to work.

Right here the genius of Mr. REED comes in play. He will repair the waste places of the South, and Republican Congressmen shall come up from regions long since given over to darkness and Democracy. The plan upon which he would have this done is entirely original, and is set forth with charming frankness in the Review article referred to. He first assumes it as an admitted fact that, in violation of the Constitution of the United States and of the law of the land, the negro vote of the South is suppressed by "intimidation with shotguns and mobs," or neutralized by "stuffing of the ballot-boxes," and "systematic falsification of returns." He admits that the motive underlying this policy is a desire to save the Southern States from negro domination, and to that he not only offers no objection, but virtually commits himself to a policy of Federal non-interference.

"But," says Mr. REED—and here he begins to develop his plan—"this justification does not in the least touch the subject of Federal elections. Every Southern man knows that there is no possibility of negro domination in the United States." He sees no reason why the barbarians who have to be driven from the State ballot-box in the interest of civilization may not be freely admitted to the national ballot-box in the interest of Republican domination in the House of Representatives. He continues:

"If all this wrong at the ballot-box be needed to preserve a proper local State government to keep the Caucasian supreme in the State, not a living soul can dare to say that the same wrong, or any other, is necessary for Caucasian supremacy in the United States."

"Suppose it were a fact that negro domination and barbarism would follow from honest voting in the Southern State elections; suppose it were a fact that disregard of law and complete violation of the rights secured to the negro by the Constitution were absolutely necessary to preserve the civilization of the South; what has that to do with Federal elections? Violation of law and disregard of statutes are not needed to save the United States."

That is to say, the negro barbarians ought to be allowed the casting vote to determine whether Republican or Democratic policies shall control the House of Representatives. If there is a weak place in Mr. REED's plan it is this, that he attempts to distinguish between negro domination and the domination of one set of white men over another by the aid of negroes. This is a distinction which the white Democrats of the Northern tier of former slave States have thus far refused to recognize. It does not follow, however, that they will be proof against the blandishments of Mr. REED.

Our new apostle of compromise between the sections indulges in no sentimental cant about the negro's violated rights. It is only the right of his party to have the negro votes counted in its favor at Congress elections that appears to him so deeply to concern our whole people. With superb directness he says:

"Evidently, then, the question of race, supremacy, and of good government in the South has nothing whatever to do with that other question which concerns our whole people, whether the Republican party of the United States shall receive and have counted the votes which belong to it by virtue of the Constitution of the country."

The sinfulness of depriving the Republican party, at Congress elections, of the Southern negro votes "which belong to it by virtue of the Constitution of the country," is too obvious for argument. The denial to the negro of a share in the control of his own home government, which Mr. REED avers to be the recognized Southern practice, does not so much vex his sense of justice. He tolerates negro proscription for State purposes, and tacitly admits that it is an overwhelming necessity for the preservation of civilization.

This is, of course, an admission that the negroes are barbarians as well as legal voters, and that under the circumstances the white people are justified, even where they are in a minority, in resorting to revolutionary methods for insuring their own political supremacy. To use the vote of a man for national purposes who is too ignorant or vicious to be a State voter, would probably be justified by Mr. REED on the principle advanced by the French restaurateur, who had only addled eggs, and informed his customer that they were very good for omelet, but no good for fry.

Having thus prepared the way by yielding to his Southern Democratic brethren the right to purely Caucasian State governments, Mr. REED comes forward with his proposition for a "swap" with the Democratic party of the South. He thinks that if the Republican party agrees to the subversion of majority rule, which he declares has been accomplished in the South, the least the Democrats can do in return is to allow the Congress elections in that region to go Republican by the aid of a Federal election law. He makes his proposition on behalf of the Northern Republicans to the Southern Democrats. He treats the latter as the South, and the former as the North. He very wisely ignores the Northern Democrats and the Southern Republicans. Hear him:

"Remember that this is not a question of enteries and epithets, of reproaches and hysterics. It is a plain question of justice and fair dealing. Both sections of this country [meaning thereby the Northern Republicans and the Southern Democrats] can afford to be fair and open with each other. If you [the Democrats] say that you have a right of local self-government which we have no business to interfere with, and that unless you are allowed to go on in your own way you fear disaster most foul, the next thing for all of us [Northern Republicans and Southern Democrats] to do is to find some plan which will give us [the Republicans] the votes of the whole people of the United States, and leave you [the Southern Democrats] your local self-government."

Surely, nothing could be fairer than that if the Southern Republicans and Northern negroes and the Northern Democrats would also agree to it. Mr. REED could, perhaps, fix the Southern negroes all right to vote for Congressmen and to be denied the right to vote on all other questions; but the Northern negroes might make trouble in Indiana, New York, Ohio, Connecticut, and other States where they hold the balance of power. The Democrats of the North might make strong objection to swapping off Congress in exchange for Democratic rule in the South, which seems in no present danger of being overthrown.

Mr. REED continues:
"To put this whole matter in a nutshell, the Republican party alleges that it is deprived by all manner of devices—differing in different States, but having one common purpose—of votes which, under the Constitution of the land, that party is entitled to."

Observe that it is not the voter who is wronged, but the party which owns his vote:

"To this the parties offending reply that the suppression of votes and voters is necessary to prevent the threatened destruction of local self-government by the numerical superiority of race ignorance in very many States. We have a right, say they, to prevent, by violence or by fraud, if need be, the control of the ignorant in our own States."

"Suppose all that be so; suppose that all you are doing is needful for your preservation, and that you must keep on at all costs, how does that give you the right to govern us by your methods? If you [meaning the Southern Democrats] have the right of local self-government, have we [Republicans of the North] not the right of national self-government? If you of the States are willing to take all hazards to save yourselves from ignorant negro domination, are you going to blame us of the United States [Republicans] if we refuse to submit to fraudulent domination?"

Mr. REED's remedy for the inconvenience of too much Republicanism in the South and too little in the nation at large is the Federal control of Congress elections. Here is his scheme in his own words; its source entitles it to the careful consideration of every voter throughout the land, without regard to party or race:

"Let the country at once assume at least the count and return of its own elections. It may be that this could be done in a way that would leave the States which object to supervision [the Southern States] free from all interference from their neighbors, as it would certainly leave us free from false counting and false returns [at Federal elections]. They [the Southern white Democrats] could then govern their own people in their own way, free from Federal supervision, and the United States could govern itself free from all fear of those practices deemed indispensable to local government."

Truly this is, as Mr. REED remarks, "a practical world, where all unnecessary difficulties ought to be avoided, and where the middle way is often the best because it is the middle way." To give negro suffrage just enough play to make him Speaker again, and yet not enough to defeat any Democratic candidate for any local office in the South, would appear to be as near a middle course as could well be contrived. To a Federal election law having so conservative an end in view, what Southern Democrat can be opposed?

Mr. REED does not want to be misunderstood. He says that he does not care what is done to the negro so long as it is not done against the Republican party in a national election:

"They [the Southern States] could, if they pleased, and at their own risk, try the experiment of keeping outside of governmental power a body of men almost as large as those who govern, and in three States larger."

Here he refers to South Carolina, Mississippi, and Louisiana. He consents to the rule of the white minority in those States, but with the proviso that the Republicans must have for the national omelet the eggs which are "no good" for the local fry. His condition is thus stated:

"All we ask is that in national matters the majority of the voters in this country may rule. Why should any Southern man object to this? Under what possible pretense can it be claimed that certain States should send Representatives to Washington on the basis of a vote which is not allowed to be cast? Suppose your claim to govern yourselves under any violation of law be sound, on what do you ground your claim to govern us in the same fashion?"

Never before the present time has a Republican leader presented a plan in which the Southern Democracy and the Northern Republicans could fraternize.

They should meet together in national convention and nominate for President the great pacificator, THOMAS BRACKETT REED. The platform should be "the States for the white man, and the nation for the negro." One thing more would have to be done; the Southern negroes would have to be forced to vote for Republican candidates for Congress, for they would find fault with being excluded from State politics by an agreement between Republicans and Democrats. This can be managed, no doubt, if the two parties will only unite on Mr. REED's basis. Perhaps an amendment to the Constitution of the United States could be adopted requiring the negroes of voting age to be counted for the Republicans by Federal supervisors at Congress elections whether they vote or not, and to exclude them from voting at all other elections.

A joint caucus of the Northern Republicans and the Southern Democrats in both Houses of Congress has been suggested for an early day to consider the Speaker's manifesto.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, the Osman Digma of these Soudanese Republicans, lugs New York City into the controversy. It is only to avert attention from the main issue. Everybody agrees that New York elections were honestly conducted. Why, the Pennsylvania State Republican convention has just passed a resolution congratulating the State of New York upon its model election law. As the names of the candidates, like those in California, are all printed on one ticket, the United States supervisors directly interfere with State elections when performing their duties under this bill. This is sectional legislation, pure and simple. You can not disguise it. Speaker REED admits it. It is more than this—it is race legislation. It is intended to apply to districts where negro supremacy can be effected and perpetuated through the operations of this law. It tells the negro that he is a Republican because he is a negro, and that through the operations of this law the races shall change places, and that his race shall dominate over that of the hated white man.

It is calculated and intended to stir up race strife and to make race reconciliation impossible. It is a devilish device aimed at devilish ends. Under the pretext of suppressing violence it incites to a forced and unnatural domination, possibly to murder, rape, and rapine.

How does the negro like the picture drawn by his alleged friend, the Speaker of the House? The great Republican party makes him a chattel to be used as a political convenience whenever it is necessary and to count so much. It teaches him that from generation to generation he is to be a Republican, and, like the color of his hair, skin, and eyes, be changeless. What political party ever before claimed men on account of their color? The Speaker, in his article in the North American Review, says that their votes belong to the Republican party under the Constitution.

What race aside from the negro race would ever submit to so audacious an insult? Where such things are done a free government is impossible. Massachusetts brought the negro here through all the horrors of the middle passage. She enslaved him, and afterwards pretended to free him. But she holds on to him, and she is determined to make the most of him. She sold him as property, took him back because he was not property, and now proposes to use him to govern those to whom she originally sold him. She will never let him go.

Of all the cowardly things in the world this attempt of a great political party to maintain its supremacy by a race vote on a color line, and deny it a share in home rule, is the most despicable. It may imperil the very existence of the Republic.

Why, open your eyes! Look at it! See the whole conspiracy outlined!

Two months ago the judiciary bill was pressed through this House by the gentleman from Illinois, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. With the assistance of the Committee on Rules, he rushed it through so rapidly that members were dazed. They could not ascertain what was being done. A bill almost revolutionizing the judicial system of the United States was put through in this House in four hours. The plea of the Democratic leader for time for the House to think was refused. Only thirteen members felt like voting against a bill of such importance recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary. One hundred and eighty-three members did not vote. The great majority did not feel that they could vote on the question at all with so little time to think. A certain few had an adequate idea of the scope and effect of the bill. No Democrat seems to have seen through it, although my silver-haired friend from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] was suspicious of it. His grandfather had had some experience in hasty judicial legislation, in old Federal times, when John Adams's midnight judges were as magically created as these. But the Republican leaders—the men who are pressing this bill—understood it well.

That bill prepared the way for the carrying out of the Republican scheme under this bill. The power of appointing the Federal supervisors, the chief supervisors, and the Congressional returning boards is lodged in the United States circuit courts. It was necessary for the carrying out of the conspiracy that they should have and retain control of these courts. Some of the present judges are Democrats and some of the Republicans are advanced in years. Their places might soon be filled by Democrats.

A Democratic circuit judge is located in New York and another in Tennessee. Mr. Chief-Justice Fuller, Mr. Justice Field, and Mr. Justice Lamar, who are Democrats, hold circuit courts and are included in the term "circuit judge" as defined by the Revised Statutes. It might fall to their lot to appoint some of these chief supervisors and returning boards. That would not suit the Republican programme. The Cannon bill removes all difficulty. It relieves Messrs. Fuller, Field, and Lamar, and their colleagues from service on the circuit, and makes seventeen new circuit judgeships to be filled by Republicans. Five judges, at least, out of the nineteen who now hold circuit court, are Democrats. The new men to be appointed under the Judiciary bill will all, doubtless, be Republicans.

The proposition of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] to make these courts non-partisan was voted down by the majority of this House. Under the new Judiciary bill, then, we shall have twenty-seven circuit judges, twenty-five of whom will be Republicans and only two Democrats. The new judges are to be appointed by President Harrison, and to hold office for life. With the advice and assistance of the great chairman of the national republican committee, the Hon. MATTHEW QUAY, who can doubt that he will be able to find young Republicans to fill the positions—men with long lives before them. And the liberties of the people are to be intrusted to this partisan judiciary and the partisan chief supervisors and returning boards whom they may appoint. And judges, chief supervisors, and returning boards are all to hold office for life. The men who concocted this scheme evidently felt as John Wilcox felt when he said, "I feel that my duty to the people in this crisis requires me to rise above principle for the benefit of my party." These two bills—the Cannon bill and the Lodge bill—form a complete conspiracy against popular rights.

To resume, observe that the chief supervisors, thus appointed by packed courts, are to hold office for life. Each chief supervisor is lord of his judicial district. It may contain a dozen Congressional districts. He considers which one of the circuit judges in his district would be most serviceable for his purposes, and then informs him that he has business to present to him. The circuit judge so notified opens court himself, or, if unable to do that, chooses a district judge after his own heart and sends him to open court for the transaction of election business.

The district judge need not belong in the district in which he is to act. The chief supervisor then presents to the court a list of persons whom he considers eligible for the office of supervisor of elections. Whether they have applied for the position or not makes no difference. He may recommend whomsoever he chooses—whomsoever he considers a fit instrument for his purposes—and the court can appoint only from those whom he recommends. He also furnishes the court with information as to the persons whom he recommends. From them the court appoints the supervisors. And it is obliged to appoint at least twice as many as are required for service. This gives the chief supervisor ample opportunity to assign to duty men whom he considers most suitable for his work. He selects three for service in each election district. Not more than two are to be of the same political party, says the bill. That means that two shall be Republicans and the other may be a Democrat, Greenbacker, Prohibitionist, Woman's Suffragist, Mugwump, Independent, Featherhead, or anything but an avowed Republican. And it is carefully provided that the majority of the board—that is, the two Republicans—shall exercise the full power of the board.

The chief supervisor has complete control over the Congressional elections in his judicial district. He exercises his power through the supervisors. We have already seen that they are appointed on his recommendation, that twice as many are appointed as are needed for duty, and that from this large number he assigns to service whom he will. After he has assigned them, he has complete control over them. As the centurion in Scripture directed his subordinates, so the chief supervisor directs the supervisors. He says to one "Go," and he goeth, and to another "Come," and he cometh, and to another "Do this," and he doeth it. And if he doeth it not, the supervisor droppeth him. For he can suspend any supervisor without a moment's notice.

The bill provides that if he finds a supervisor who fails, neglects, or refuses to perform his duties, or who is incompetent, or whose habits are prejudicial, or whose integrity he has reason to doubt, he may suspend him at once. He is the judge of his own findings. He can drop an honest supervisor like a hot cake, and can cling to a dishonest one like a leech. If the member of the board who is not an avowed Republican and who may be a Democrat, Greenbacker, Prohibitionist, Woman's Suffragist, Mugwump, Independent, or Featherhead, should prove troublesome, the chief supervisor has only to suspend him. And he is not obliged to put any one in his place. The law, indeed, says that he shall do so, if possible. But he is his own judge of the possibility of the case and can easily make it impossible on election day by employing the other supervisors elsewhere.

If either of the Republican supervisors should not prove subservient, he can remove him in like manner. He can put another Republican in his place or leave it vacant and have all the work done, and all the power exercised, by the one man who suits him.

Nor is it necessary for him to suspend a supervisor in order to get rid of him. He can transfer him to another election district. For this bill gives him power to transfer any supervisor from any election district in a Congressional district to any other election district in the same Congressional district. An election might be conducted under this bill in which not a single one of the supervisors would be a resident of the county in which he served and not one a Democrat. The chief supervisor appoints the chairman and the vice-chairman of the local boards of supervisors. They may both be of the same political party. Both might be, and would be, Republicans.

These irresponsible minions of power attend upon every registration. They challenge the citizen's right to register. They visit his home, if ordered by their chief, and there by inquiry and examination verify his registration record. In towns of twenty thousand or more, at the bid of their chief, they make a house-to-house canvass of the whole or any part of the election district to ascertain by inquiry at any dwelling, building, or other place of abode in any such district or voting precinct which they may be so required to canvass, the name, age, nativity, term of residence in the country, State, city, county, parish, district, or precinct, and other qualifications as a voter, of every male person therein residing. They have a kind of supervision over naturalization. Indeed they seem to have a general supervision over everything.

On election morning they personally examine and inspect each and every ballot-box, no matter what ballots they may be intended for, whether for President, governor, judge, or coroner. They tell the voter in what box to deposit his ballot. These are a few of the things that the law provides that they shall do. The citizen is left to conjecture what they may not do.

They may require certain test oaths to be put to any and every citizen. And in case the local officers fail to put these oaths "immediately," and to pass upon the case "at once," then the supervisors acquire jurisdiction. And their decision is binding upon the local officers.

The supervisors count the ballots and canvass the vote. And then they, or such one or more of them as the chief supervisor may direct, forward the returns in duplicate to the chief supervisor and the clerk of the court. The chief supervisor then tabulates the result for presentation to the United States board of canvassers.

This returning board has been ingeniously devised. Let us see how it is to be appointed. The chief supervisor of elections notifies one of the circuit judges of his district to hold court for the purpose of appointing returning boards.

But why so unusual and peculiar a method of informing the learned judges of the United States courts of a piece of law that every school-boy in the country will have heard about? The Republican leaders know well that all courts take judicial notice of general laws. They know that the courts will take notice of this law. Why, then, could not the courts themselves have been directed to meet and make these appointments of themselves and without such peculiar notice? Ah, the answer is clear. There are some Democrats among the judges. There will be more. The Republicans on the bench might not prove sufficiently partisan. It might fall to the lot of one of the Democratic judges to appoint some of the returning boards. That would not do, and this bill will effectively prevent it. The chief supervisor can be relied on to notify only Republican judges who will appoint such canvassing boards as the Republican party desires. He makes the detail of the judge.

After knowledge of the law has been brought home to a trusty judge in this remarkable manner, he holds court in some one of the many districts in his circuit of several States. The court then appoints returning boards, one for each State in the circuit. Each of these boards consists of three members, who are to hold office for life. They are to be citizens and residents of the States for which they serve, and not more than two of them are to be members of the same political party. This simply means that two of them will be Republicans. The third may be a Democrat, Greenbacker, Prohibitionist, Woman's Suffragist, Mugwump, Independent, Featherhead, Mormon, or anything but an avowed Republican. The court names the chairman of the board.

After the election the board canvasses the vote for Congressman in all the districts of the State and declares what candidates are entitled to seats. Imagine these three gentlemen, appointed for life by a circuit judge sitting in Vermont, canvassing the vote of the great State of New York, with its thirty-four members of Congress. The New York Representative who votes for this bill ought to blush with shame. He will repent of it in sackcloth and ashes. All the members of the board need not agree in reaching a conclusion as to who has been elected. A majority—the two Republicans—are sufficient, and exercise the full powers of the board. The other member may dissent if he thinks it worth while, but his dissent has no influence on the result.

The decision of the majority, the two Republicans on the board, is practically final. The only appeal lies to a House of Representatives returned by such boards. The decisions of the returning boards, however, bind the Clerk of this House. He is to be punished severely, as for a felony, if in any case whatever he fails to govern himself by their decision. The State returns and the State certificates of election go for naught.

The penal provisions of this bill are worthy to rank with the English penal code for Ireland. To give one instance:

Any person, who, knowingly or willfully or fraudulently interferes with, delays, or hinders in any manner any supervisor of election, inspector, poll-clerk, or other officer of election in the discharge of his duties, shall, upon conviction, be adjudged guilty of a felony, and be punished for every such offense with imprisonment in a State prison for not less than one year nor more than five years.

The United States marshals are appointed by the President. Now they are all Republicans. Under a Democratic President they will be Democrats. The Republican scheme requires that the Republican party shall have complete control of the police power as well as of the courts and supervisors. This bill gives it to them. The chief supervisors, who are appointed by Republican courts, and who are sure to be Republicans, and who hold for life, are given complete control over the marshals and their deputies in all election matters. "The number of the special deputies who may be appointed for election purposes shall be determined from time to time at conferences between the marshal and the chief supervisor of elections." But here the chief supervisor bears the same relation to the conference that the dorky did to his wife. Sambo said: "Me an' my wife am one, an' I am dat one."

The number of deputies is to be determined by the chief supervisor and the marshal at a conference. It is obvious that the two might disagree, but some one's opinion must govern or nothing can be done. The marshal must give way; for the law says, "No other or greater number of special deputies shall be appointed than the chief supervisor shall from time to time certify to be in his opinion necessary." Most plainly the conference is only a matter of form, when no "other number" is to be appointed than the chief supervisor certifies to be necessary. We see that the supervisor dictates the number to be appointed. Still he has no direct power to appoint, and the quality of the men might not suit—they might be too good. This bill provides for that. "One-third of the special deputy marshals appointed in any authorized place must and shall be taken and named from such list of persons as shall be forwarded the marshal by the chief supervisor of elections."

To make the chief supervisor's power over the marshal and his deputies complete it is further provided that "in making assignments of such special deputy marshals as shall be appointed, the marshal shall be governed by the request of the chief supervisor of elections." Could the marshal and his deputies be more thoroughly enslaved to the chief supervisor?

These deputy marshals, the mere creatures of the chief supervisor, the irresponsible minions of his power, are to be employed in making domiciliary visits to the home of every citizen.

Nor is this all. In the absence of the deputy marshals, or when called on by them, the supervisors themselves have the full power of deputy marshals. They can arrest a voter if challenging him does not accomplish what they want.

This is imperialism outright. It is machinery to hold on to power, instead of returning it to the people every two years. Juarez would have had just as good a chance in running against Maximilian for Emperor of Mexico as a Democrat would have in running for Congress in a fairly close district under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I have said nothing of the application of this bill to New York. That city, sir, has more than a vivid recollection of the way in which the Federal election law was enforced in 1872. Our foreign-born citizens will never forget it. It was true, as the gentleman from Massachusetts has observed, that a few fraudulent naturalization papers were issued in 1868. It was upon this pretense that every foreign-born citizen who appeared at the polls with a Democratic ticket in his hand, exhibiting naturalization papers issued in 1868, was arrested and imprisoned. His papers were taken from him, and in hundreds of instances never returned to him. In vain he pleaded at the office of the United States supervisor for their return.

I say that there are to-day hundreds of foreign-born citizens in the State of New York, entitled to vote, who can not exercise the franchise because they were robbed of their papers at that time. The plain maxim of justice and law, that a man is presumed to be innocent until proven guilty, was reversed. The rule that ninety-nine guilty men should escape rather than that one innocent man should suffer, was reversed. Every Democrat naturalized in 1868 was presumed to be guilty. Ninety-nine innocent men were punished that one guilty man might not escape. The innocent lost their naturalization papers and the punishment was lasting. No foreign-born citizen in New York State will advocate the passage of this law. They know too well what it means when executed by John I. Davenport. His crafty hand, I am told, was employed in the drafting of this measure. He is a man of brains and an unrelenting partisan. No man better understands the purposes of this bill and no man is better calculated to carry them out.

The supervisors of election are to be appointed at the request of 100 voters from any Congressional district. Under the new State election law there are over one hundred election precincts in the district which I have the honor to represent. Six hundred men at least, aside from clerks and deputy marshals, would have to be appointed, under the law, in such a district as mine. Does any one imagine that one hundred of the six hundred who are looking for places would hesitate to sign a request that United States supervisors be appointed? You may be sure that such a request would be preferred in every Congressional district in the city of New York and in every city in the State with more than 20,000 inhabitants. There is no sentiment in politics with such men as these. They look for the financial results and for the financial opportunities offered under the appointment.

New York City has suffered for years under an unjust Republican apportionment. That, however, is a State matter and can be, and will be, remedied by the people. This is a national matter. It is entirely beyond remedy by the votes of the people and a hundredfold more exasperating. And this bill will apply to St. Louis, Chicago, Boston, Baltimore, Savannah, Atlanta, Memphis, and every other great city.

The whole machinery of this bill is unrepresentative, partisan, unfair, and centralizing to the last degree. A State would not tolerate such a law even if enacted by its own Legislature. The great mass of the officers who carry it out are not required to reside in the counties where they perform their duties. Not one of them is elected by the people or responsible to them. The number of circuit judges is greatly increased in order that a Republican President may pack these courts with Republicans. As the judges hold office for life, they are entirely independent of the people. The returning boards and chief supervisors are appointed by the courts. Like the judges who appoint them, they, too, are given life offices to perpetuate their power and shackle the people.

The precinct supervisors, though appointed by the courts in name, are nominated and selected and assigned to duty by the chief supervisors. They hold office so long as they please their chief, and no longer. Intrenched behind this breastwork, a gang of rascals might hold the House of Representatives fifty years from now, though the people were against them and the Senate and President had long been opposed to them. Holding the courts, they could not be convicted. Holding the House, they could not be impeached.

This bill is a menace to liberty and popular government. It is an invitation to frauds of the worst character and greatest magnitude. It makes it possible for a few men to substitute their own will for that of the people. I dislike to believe that it was framed with a view to the commission of crime and the subversion of popular government. I hate to think that of gentleman on the other side; but I find it hard to doubt it. The bill is revolutionary and partisan from beginning to end. One of its features brands it with the mark of Cain. I refer to that which dispenses with our present system of choosing mixed juries and substitutes for it a system by which partisan juries may be chosen.

Who can be blind to the purpose of such a change in the law? Who can say that it is adapted to any other purpose than the protection of the perpetrators of fraud? Who can look on calmly and see an elaborate system framed to stifle the voice of the people and protect the instruments of crime? What patriot can see without sorrow the National Legislature made dependent upon the judiciary and the judiciary made instruments of partisanship, oppression, and corruption?

Some may think that the time has come when they must rise above principle for the benefit of party. They are sadly mistaken. The people will rise above party for the sake of principle. The time has come when patriotic men should rise above party trammels to maintain the spirit of the Constitution and the liberties of the people. The people demand it, and the people expect it.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, no graver question, no more important theme, touching the happiness and the prosperity of our people has engaged or can engage the attention of Congress than the measure that is now presented for our consideration. The spirit that should characterize the discussion of that question should be I read, fair, friendly, manly, and truthful. I regret to note very much what has been said, not only here in this discussion, but elsewhere, that the idea prevails and the belief exists in some portions of the country that there is an unfriendly feeling in the North towards the citizens of the South. I do not believe that that feeling exists. For myself I can say that at no period in my life have I entertained such feelings. It is believed by some that the Republicans of the North entertain a bitter and unfriendly feeling towards our Southern neighbors. At no time in my life, even when we were brought into the closest and most dangerous relations, did I entertain such a feeling; and I believe in saying this that I represent Northern sentiment on the subject in the Republican party. I know, too, that in saying this I represent, in a strong degree, most of those who in the darker days came closest to our Southern neighbors.

But, Mr. Speaker, it does not follow by any means that because we feel thus friendly towards one another—and I do hope that I regard among my friends on this floor as warm and generous ones on that side of this Chamber as on this; I know that I reciprocate every such generous feeling on their part—but what I was about to say is it does not follow, because of these feelings which do and should exist, that what we believe to be grave wrongs should be treated lightly. I must not be expected to say that black is white or that crimes are virtues. It must not be expected, when I feel that I am being wronged or that those whom I represent are being wronged, that I am to touch but lightly on those wrongs as though they were but mere trifles. Let us be kind, but let us be honest with each other in treating this subject.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in this connection it has been charged openly in this debate and it is hurled broadcast into every campaign in the country that the Republicans as a party and that Republican politicians, so called, agitate this Southern question in order to strengthen and unite the Republican party. I want to say to gentlemen who use that blade that there is a sharp knife in its handle if it is not sharp at the point. No class of politicians in this country use this Southern question, so called, more cunningly, more industriously, or more vigorously than do the leaders in the South of public sentiment—the Democratic leaders. And, gentlemen, I appeal to this Chamber which class, if both use it, which I will admit for the sake of the argument—and I will not stop to discuss whether both use it honestly or not, but I will concede even that for the sake of the argument—but where will this agitation be most effective? Will it tell most where education most exists; where there is the broadest enlightenment; where every home is the repository of a newspaper and in close companionship with the school-house and the church? I appeal to the statistics of your country to show where the demagogues, as these people have been termed, who use it can be most effective. Consult the statistics and gentlemen will find where the temptation exists for using that argument.

But, sir, I go further on that subject. I say that that party or that politician who uses the argument without having a foundation of truth for its use employs a weapon which will, in time, react upon him who draws the blade. Broad and liberal discussion, the growth of education, and the exchange of ideas will lead this country finally to the truth; and if it be true that great wrongs are being perpetrated the people will eventually see it and those who use the argument falsely will finally pay the penalty.

Mr. Speaker, there are two broad issues in this contest which I will name: The first question involved is as to the rights of the community, the people as a whole, and the second is the right of the individual citizen or member of the Republic.

First I will address myself to the rights of the community.

In touching upon that branch of the subject, I ask, first, what is the object of this supervisor law? It is to secure the fair election of members of Congress. It is to permit the sovereign citizen to freely and fairly exercise his sovereign right at the ballot-box. The object is not to throttle the liberty of the citizen, as some have been bold enough to say, but the object is to see that the broadest liberty shall obtain wherever a citizen of the Republic seeks to exercise his highest right of sovereignty. The object of this law is to enable the majority to govern the Republic, and not the minority. Is that right? Should not every citizen give his approval to that sentiment, to that aim? It is not a new proposition, but an enlargement of the law that has been in force for eighteen years and approved by the Supreme Court.

Now, the first question that comes up, and I submit this question to both sides of the Chamber, is this: Are the alleged frauds, which this legislation seeks to cope with, of such magnitude as to invite the clearly and well defined exercise of the constitutional powers which Congress possesses to treat with it? I want to say to my Republican associates, if such frauds do not exist, then our Republican platforms that have assailed them, contain falsehoods, and the Republican press that have charged it are full of lies, and the orator or stumper who charges that frauds permeate our national elections should be denounced as a lying scoundrel. If frauds of great magnitude do exist, then it becomes the duty of the American Congress to act calmly but bravely within its constitutional powers, and to reach these gigantic evils and suppress them. If they do not exist, I say the party orator or stumper or politician, call him as you will, that goes through the country denouncing Southern frauds and brutalities at elections ought to seal his lips forever on that question. We are not appealing to the Constitution to deal with trifles, but to reach what we believe to be a gigantic evil. If these evils do not exist, Republicans should vote against this bill; if they do exist, I can not comprehend how any Republican can vote against this measure. Now, do they exist?

Are there wrongs touching elections that appeal to the American Congress for further action?

Mr. OATES. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him there, I think he is pursuing the correct line of argument, and I wish to say to him that I would like him to produce the proof of frauds which should justify this legislation. I deny their existence and demand their proof. I reject the proof as circulated in the newspapers and ask my friend to proceed to the authentic evidence.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I can not yield. I want to say now, not as a reflection upon the interruption of my friend from Alabama, that I am limited to one hour, which is a very short time for a member of the committee that reported this bill to address himself to the subject. I say this now so that gentlemen will not feel called upon to interrupt, as I will not be able to yield, though I would like to do so.

Mr. OATES. If the gentleman will allow me, I interrupted because I think the manner in which he is proceeding to discuss the question is the correct one, and I call upon him at this stage to bring his proof.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I think the gentleman from Alabama has anticipated my thoughts, and I wish to say that in the brief time of one hour, on a subject which I ought to have four or five hours to discuss, it will be impossible for me to yield to my friends on either side of the House, although I would be glad to. But as we have the right on both sides, particularly under the five-minute rule, to correct any mistakes if we make any, I hope that I will not be interrupted.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to the question of proof. I say first that this nation needs no proof. There is not a man in this Chamber but knows that frauds gigantic, condoned, approved of, advocated, exist.

Mr. McRAE. Do frauds exist in your district?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. No, sir; nor in Iowa. There is hardly a school-boy old enough to enter the schools but knows that the statement I have made is correct touching the notoriety of Southern frauds. And I was glad to note the manly courage of that able and eloquent Representative from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL], who at no time in that grand speech of his, from its beginning to its close, forgot the dictates of an honest heart by even attempting the shadow of a denial. [Applause on the Republican side.] Further than that, Mr. Speaker, no Southern gentleman has traversed the proposition in this debate.

Secondly, Congressional investigations had by the House and by the Senate in Congress after Congress, on sworn evidence taken not alone from Republicans, not alone from our colored citizens, but from white Democrats, have proved again and again the existence of gigantic frauds, frauds systematically, studiously planned, engaged in, and carried out.

Thirdly, and nearly in the same line, the Congressional contests in this Fifty-first Congress have proved it without a doubt—eighteen contests in this House, seventeen of them from Southern States; $70,000 expended in contests for seats in this House, and the bills waiting to be provided for in the general deficiency bill; the greatest expense that has ever been incurred in connection with election frauds since the Forty-sixth Congress, when the aggregated expense amounted to a little over $74,000. These proofs I can not take up the time to recapitulate.

The honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL], chairman of the Committee on Elections, in his speech the other day gave us a sad, sad list of crimes that had been committed in the name of law against the highest right of the American citizen, wrongs that should bring the blush to many faces, wrongs that should bring down condemnation instead of wit, burning sarcasm, and hollow laughter. [Applause on Republican side.]

Ah, gentlemen, when the proofs, sworn to, show the crimes that have been committed, no wonder that I am warranted in saying even the children know of their existence.

Fourth. The existence of these crimes is not denied by the South. There may be now and then a very brave and hardy Northern Democrat who will deny it. [Laughter on the Republican side.] But Southern Democrats, brave and manly as they are in open war, physical or intellectual, do not deny it. Go to the Southern States and mingle with the people there as I have done. Mingle with them anywhere and everywhere and they are too brave and honest to deny a fact which they defend in their hearts and with their lips and acts. I understand their excuse. I know what their feelings and what their troubles are. I have had them say to me, "HENDERSON, how would you feel if a law were passed that would allow your chattels, your horse or your ox, to vote to make the laws to govern you? Look at our condition." I understand their line of thought. I have tried to put myself in their places in order to be just with men for whom I entertain affection and friendship. I would be glad if I could put myself in their place and still say that the true remedy is defiance of law and the perpetration of wrongs and crimes that should be wiped from the pages of this great century, but I can not.

Fifth. The frauds are admitted. I pass beyond the fact that they are not denied. I say they are admitted by those who live amongst them and who enjoy the fruits of those great wrongs. What is the meaning of this splendid burst of eloquence from the distinguished representative from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL], which I clipped from The Evening Star? I regret that I have not been able to find the original speech in the RECORD as yet.

Here it is as I find it in last evening's Star, including the subhead or caption:

THE WHITES MUST RULE THE SOUTH.

Mr. HEMPHILL continued: "We know we must either rule the South or leave it. Now, for myself, before the people of the United States and before God in all reverence I swear we will not leave it. [Applause.] It is the home of our fathers. There their bones lie buried. They bought it with their blood when Concord and Lexington were the battle-field of this country. They have handed it down to us unimpaired, and, gentlemen, are we now our fathers' sons? Shall the blood first turn back in our veins? Shall we transmit to coming generations a great and a noble State which has been overruled and downtrodden by a race whom God never intended should rule over us? I do not hesitate to say the colored man has as many rights as I have; but he can not have his rights and mine too. And this law is intended to put him again in control of the Southern States; intended to awaken that race prejudice which is fast dying out; intended to bring about again that constant irritation and clash between the two colors in the South which will retard its growth and which will be destructive of the very principles of human government."

I want no further proof for me than that. I want no further proof for my people. That gentleman's speech was a declaration to the people of the country that the black citizens of South Carolina should not exercise the rights guaranteed them by the Constitution of the United States. Who wants more proof? The opening, the grand, dashing charge in this debate from the other side, by an old and distinguished member of Congress, a truly typical representative of the Southern gentleman and statesman, living in a State which has an overwhelming colored majority of its population, a majority of colored voters, tells the country that they shall not exercise their constitutional rights. What more proof is demanded by any reasonable man?

Mr. BUCKALEW. I hope the gentleman will permit me to make a remark there.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I do not know that my friend heard me at the beginning of my remarks, when I said that I would not be able to yield to any gentleman. I have already declined to yield. I wish I had unlimited time, for no man more enjoys interruptions, with the benefits that come from a free exchange in debate, than myself.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. I agree we should have more time, for this is a very grave subject.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. The gentleman from Mississippi intelligently calls it a "grave" subject; and I state to him that his country is full of graves [applause], and the wit of my excellent friend must take other form than that. [Laughter.] But I must decline to permit interruption.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I only wish to interrupt the gentleman for a moment.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. The only trouble is that if I yield to you it will make me break over the rule which I must apply to all. You will have an opportunity to answer for yourself fully and freely and I can not have my time frittered away. Half of it is gone now, and I have not entered upon the discussion of many things that I desire to speak about.

Mr. OATES. We will file an exception in his favor.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I must decline to yield.

Mr. BUCKALEW. All right.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Now, I ask what means this South Carolina oath, for such it was? It means defiance of the rule of the majority. It means defiance of the Constitution. I say, and feel myself warranted in saying, that it is as dangerous as armed rebellion; and I mean it when I say it. What is the effect of it? It means, gentlemen, that, if that proposition is to go untraversed by law and by constitutional power vested in us, we are willing that a handful of men in this country may shape and control Congress and the executive and judicial departments of this Government. Now, let us see if I am right in that statement.

I will deal with the census of 1880 briefly. I take that as the only authentic evidence we have. We had under that census a total population of 50,155,783 people, black and white.

The total voting population as shown by that census was 12,830,349. The total voting population of the following States, namely, Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia, was 2,826,966; but of this 2,826,966 there are only 1,741,524 white voters, there being 1,085,462 colored voters. So that these control, if we are right in our proposition, the whole country, or the 50,000,000. In these States, Mr. Speaker, with 1,741,524 voters, standing on the South Carolina platform, "shoulder to shoulder," applauding his manly declarations, we have a force that controls the balance of power in this country. So that to define the fact, if left unrestrained by law, they will control the 50,000,000 people. But let us go a step further than that. Three States, namely, Louisiana, Mississippi, and South Carolina, have each a colored majority in population, the aggregate majority being 412,821; these three States, on the South Carolina plan, can control the balance of power in a general election in this country and can control the majority of the House of Representatives, of which we are members. That is to say, these three States, with an aggregate white vote of 403,964 can virtually control our 50,000,000 of people.

Mr. OATES. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa has declined to yield.

Mr. OATES. I wish to correct the statement which the gentleman has made. I deny your proposition as to Louisiana. The census shows a majority of 800 whites in that State.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I get from the census the population of those States.

I can not allow this interruption. I give the facts as the census states them, and the gentleman can correct them if they are not right. You have plenty of time of your own.

Mr. OATES. I will do that.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. The population of Louisiana, under the Tenth Census, was, colored, 453,655; white, 454,954; a majority of colored population of 28,701. In Mississippi the colored population was 650,291; the white population was 479,398. In South Carolina the colored population was 604,332; white, 391,105; a colored majority of 213,227. You may have induced your census enumerators in 1880 to whittle that 412,821 in these three States in such a shape as to claim that you have got a majority of the voters, or you may, as is more than likely, have counted every head, man, woman, and child, in such a way that the full colored vote will not be counted as voters in order to justify your position, but it will be hard for any gentleman upon this floor to make the country believe that these three States, having over 400,000 colored majority of population in the aggregate, have not a majority of colored voters. They do not often get a chance to record their votes, but they are there; and that is not all. They have increased in the decade ending 1880 with a rapidity that is astonishing. From 1860 to 1870 the increase in colored population was 40,000; while from 1870 to 1880 it was 2,100,000. You had detected another way to increase your power by fixing figures to give the South increased representation in this House, and you have to-day a representation of forty members, or nearly that number, in this very Congress based on this great colored population, and the only representative of that race here is my friend Mr. CHEATHAM, of North Carolina.

You talk, some of you, about people coming here with "the seal of the governor of a sovereign State." The Seventh district of South Carolina has 32,000 colored voters and 7,000 white voters, yet a Democratic gentleman from South Carolina walks boldly up to take the oath at that desk with a certificate from the governor of that "sovereign" State to back him. This Congress hopes to correct that little error on the part of "a governor of a sovereign State." Why, even some of our Northern Democratic friends have admitted the existence of these frauds. One of the great chiefs of Tammany, the distinguished SPINOLA, on the 11th of April, in this House, gave utterance to the following language:

Mr. SPINOLA. I wish here and now to have it known that elections with us are different from what they are in the Southern States.

He was having a tilt with our friend from Tennessee [Mr. EXLOR], who on that evening, as usual, was paying his attention to the killing of private pension bills, and got Brother SPINOLA "riled" enough to tell some wholesome truths. The statement I have just read was followed by "laughter and applause," and then the talk went on.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I should say so.

Mr. SPINOLA. With us it is a struggle to put a man in this House. There is a desperate conflict in almost every Democratic district at the North. Below Mason and Dixon's line it is an easy matter. One gentleman is declared to be the candidate, his neighbors rally round him, he is put to no expense, he is called upon to perform no labor in the canvass, the ballots are printed, and they are deposited and he is elected.

Brother SPINOLA hit it well. Everybody knows it. I pass now from the proposition that the frauds exist.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the extract which I am about to read is reliable or not, but I find in a Democratic paper, The Alexandria Gazette and Virginia Advertiser of June 18 the following from the special Washington correspondence of that journal:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 18, 1890.

The House Committee on the Election of President and Vice-President will report the Federal election bill to the House to-morrow. It will pass that day as soon as the Committee on Rules shall fix a day for its consideration. Some Democratic Senators, among them Mr. GORMAN, speak confidently of its defeat in the body in which they are members. Mr. MILLS, of the House, also thinks the help Democratic Senators rendered the silver Republicans will induce the latter to re-eprocate on the bill referred to. Should it become a law Mr. MILLS thinks its chief effect would be a great increase in the death-rate of Federal election officers in the South.

I say I do not know whether Mr. MILLS said this or not, but I have given my authority. It is another declaration somewhat like the one we have had from the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL], saying in substance this: "We defy the law. The shotgun or the dagger, any speedy implement of death, shall protect us from constitutionally enacted laws if they interfere with our political control."

We have it from the silver-tongued Representative from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] and also from the great leader from Texas himself [Mr. MILLS], if this Democratic authority which I have quoted is to be believed.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I will interrupt the gentleman long enough to call his attention to the fact that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] is not on the floor.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I am sorry that he is not. I am curious to know whether this is true or not. Meantime I have given my authority and I claim nothing for it beyond what I have stated.

Now, I want to ask this House and those who are interested in preventing the passage of a law which has but one end, namely, to permit every American citizen to cast his vote and have it counted, whether it be cast for a Democratic or Republican Representative—I want to ask them if they believe that this country will continue to allow a minority to control it. It is said that things will get worse if we strengthen the law which is now on the statute-book and recognized by the highest judicial authority in the country. I say that this country will no longer submit to the rule of a minority.

It is said that from the passage of this law greater wrongs will occur than those which it is intended to remedy, wider differences between the white man and the black, and that the existing condition will work itself out. It has had a long time to try the working-out process. It has become smooth and well oiled, but it works. You have had four years of executive control, gentlemen, from this minority plan. "Before that God who sits on the rim of the universe," appealed to by my friend from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL], Grover Cleveland had no right to a seat in the White House. [Applause on the Republican side.] By the same great Power I declare that you have not had an honest Democratic majority here for twenty-five years and more. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, gentlemen, I do not believe that this is a matter to be trifled with. I do not like this law as well as I would like another. I believe in going to the full constitutional length and taking absolute control of the election of members of Congress; but my views have been overruled by a majority of my associates. But even this mild form of bill arouses an opposition and excites a degree of feeling unseen in the consideration of any other measure. For my part, gentlemen, while the answer given by my eloquent friend from Maryland [Mr. McCOMAS] to my friend from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] this morning was true, when he said that there were "no bayonets or blue-coats in this bill," I want to announce my position. I say that for one before I will consent that a minority of the people of this country shall govern the majority I will favor such legislation as will secure the protection of every ballot by a killing bullet, so that every voter may have his equal rights. [Applause.] Those are my sentiments.

What is there to fear in this law? If you want an honest election you have nothing to fear. If you want every citizen to vote, you have nothing to fear from this law. If you want every vote counted you have nothing to fear from it. If you want frauds to govern then you may well fear it. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO] and some others have spoken of "hirelings" in connection with this bill. I am not aware that the officers of State elections work for nothing. I think the State pays them. I do not believe that if, for instance, my friend from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], whose integrity we all recognize, should be designated by State law as an officer of election, we would any of us be warranted in saying that he had been thereby seduced into becoming a dishonest man. So I say that if his commission should emanate from the Federal power I do not think he would be any less a man to be respected and trusted.

Does it follow that because citizens of your own State hold a Federal commission they are to be called scoundrels any more than the men commissioned by your own State authorities? Where is the logic in any such position? It is not that, gentlemen; it is not that they hold a Federal commission instead of a State commission. It is because this well oiled, never-failing State machinery allows a few Southern men to dictate the policy of this Republic. That is what is the matter and that is what we object to. But I have not time to extend my remarks on that head.

In passing I wish to say we are told by South Carolina—that admits the condition of things and takes an oath that it shall continue—we are told that what we really need to solve the situation is a "new North." The South, defiantly boasting of its disregard of the Constitution and the liberty of the citizen, coolly tells us this. You will get it. A "new North" is near at hand. Gentlemen, we have peacefully, patiently submitted for years and years to this injustice and mighty wrong. We have seen our fellow-countrymen butchered on "the altar of liberty" that is talked about this morning. We have seen the control of this Government by red hands wrested from its proper channels; and I say to you that the "new North" is at hand which will insist upon the enforcement of the law and the equal rights of every citizen. [Applause.] I speak not yet of individual rights, but of the rights of this Government and of the whole people.

Now, then, as to the second proposition, individual rights. I do not know that I could make any impression upon many of my friends on the other side by any appeal in behalf of the individual citizen; but, gentlemen, it is as certain as that sad events came and passed by, leaving their shadows and their still overhanging and dripping clouds, that injustice to individuals prepared a great portion of this country for a revolt against the kindest Government on earth and the best, a Government that drew to its bosom my eloquent friend from New Jersey [Mr. McADOO], myself, and millions of others. That condition of things, injustice to the individual year after year, blunted and dulled sensibilities that ought to have been bright and brave as they were during the days of Lexington and Concord. So, too, I warn my friends in the South that this injustice to a portion of our citizens numbering away up in the millions, who are your neighbors, not of their own choice—"the bones of whose fathers lie in the graves of South Carolina," and the blood of whose fathers and mothers makes sacred Southern soil—I proclaim here and now as my judgment that the condition of injustice which exists is working at this hour as certain—oh, I hope not so sad—a cure as came from the injustice which existed when slavery prevailed among you. How or when I can not tell:

God works in a mysterious way his wonders to perform;

but depend upon it that the blood of the martyrs at your homes will force redress and that liberty will yet find peace in every State of our great Union.

Fair play is the foundation stone of our citizenship. Why are we to ignore the rights of a man because God made him black? Why, sir, I remember once seeing an old lady teaching her little boy about the African. There was a picture of men of the different races; and the attention of the little boy was arrested by the black face; with a curious expression of eagerness he wanted to know about that man. I remember well the answer and the lesson from that mother. She said, "That is the negro," and here was her philosophy that she buried in that young heart to stay:

Their skin it is black, but 'twas God made them thus;
And He made them with bodies and feelings like us.

Let the gentle but profound philosophy of that mother find lodgment in your hearts and the race problem is solved in this country.

Gentlemen, what is the difficulty in recognizing what God has said on this question? Are we not safe in doing that? The members of the colored race have the same instincts, the same great impulses as ourselves. Many of your people have nursed at their bosoms; you have been dressed by them, carried by them as children; you have lived in the closest and tenderest relations with them. Yet when they walk up before you or after you to cast a ballot you tell me "We can not endure them." You can not answer why. It will not do. I appeal in that great name which was appealed to by South Carolina. Let us try a little justice by our fellow-man and see how it will work. You have tried the other method long enough. Do not forget that every citizen wronged under the shadow of law is made a conspirator against the law and the power that makes it. Dream not that six millions of people who have by their Maker been endowed with darker skins than ours, but by our Constitution have been clothed with the same powers that you and I possess as citizens—dream not that these individuals will endure all this and that no danger lies in their sufferings.

Better far, my fellow-citizens, that these men be allowed to go up beside you, as they are empowered by the Constitution to do, and register their views on public men and public measures. Try it for awhile. God knows we want no Federal supervisor laws or election laws. Some of you think we do, but we do not. I tell you, gentlemen, this side of the Chamber has no desire, and it is no pleasant duty, to meet these great questions where there are such sharp issues between us. Do not fear but that there will always be plenty of issues between parties in this country. It is more agreeable to the statesman, or the politician, or the public man, call him what you will, to deal with those great economic questions which touch every hearth and every heart than it is to be grappling with these issues which stir up animosities between fellow-citizens. There will always be issues to put into platforms. Try to avoid those issues which make graves and sadness and which harrow up the human heart. I tell you, fellow-citizens—pardon me if I use in this House that best of all terms—I tell you that the heart-beats at the North that you may laugh and sneer at want justice done by those people as individuals as much as they want to be protected in their rights as members and parts of the people of the Republic.

The proposition made by some is, "We will make them leave; the black man must get out of the way." And that Utopian dream is indulged in by some men standing high in public positions. Move the colored man away! Where? Answer it yourselves. When? Answer that. How? Answer that. But here is a fitting answer in resolutions passed by the Afro-American convention or congress which assembled in the city of Chicago in February last:

Resolutions adopted at a convention where there were one hundred and thirty-one representatives from twenty-one sovereign States to discuss this great question.

Here are the resolutions that they adopted:

Whereas the preponderance of Afro-Americans in the States of Alabama, South Carolina, Louisiana, Mississippi, and other Southern States makes the situation painful and uncomfortable for the small minority of white fellow-citizens residing therein: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That we do petition the honorable Congress of the United States to make and provide for an appropriation of $100,000,000 to furnish the unhappy white citizens of those States who may desire to settle in other and more favored States, free from Afro-American majorities, with free transportation and lunch by the way, to any States north of Mason and Dixon's line.

Be it further resolved, That the Congress select Senator MORGAN, of Alabama, Senator HAMPTON, of South Carolina, and Senator GIBSON, of Louisiana, to be the Moses to direct the unhappy people out of the States of their misfortunes.

There is a grim eloquence, Mr. Speaker, in these resolutions. Why have not these people the right to make these declarations as well as any other people? Why have they not as much right as the man whose citizenship is not forced upon him? Does he possess less sacred rights than a gentleman who selects his place of citizenship? No one need be told who reads aright the history of the Republic how these poor people came to be citizens of South Carolina and of these other Southern States. But their rights are now as sacred or more sacred under heaven than those of any of the gentlemen who say, "We defy you and we defy the laws of our common country."

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa be permitted to proceed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For how long a time?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I shall try to conclude in ten minutes.

Mr. OATES. There is no objection if it comes out of the time on that side.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. That has been the rule, I believe, when extensions have been granted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I desire to thank the House for the courtesy.

Mr. Speaker, I have been indicating one key to this whole situation. I wish now to suggest another. The key to this situation, I say, is in the observance of law. Where that can not be secured I say we must make the laws to secure that observance. We have tried waiting long enough, and we have waited in vain.

Then, again, there is another key: education. I am a believer in the broadest and most liberal education of the people; and I was sorry, when for the first time in twenty-five years I revisited the South two years ago, not to find more evidences of the extension of school-houses than on the occasion when I was there before. Let us see school-houses arising on all hands and let us see them visited by all of the children of the community, getting the benefits of an education.

I hope much from the business developments of the entire country. I find that the interchange of trade and commerce between the North and South will go far towards, in time, remedying this great trouble. But it must not be forgotten that there were full and generous business relations between the North and South prior to 1861; but that was in itself no remedy for the evils that fell upon us.

Another thing from which I hope much is from the decay of bitter feeling, which, I regret to say, still exists in the South towards the North. You charge the North with having that feeling towards the South; but, gentlemen, you vastly mistake. It does not exist. The North simply contends for fair play, and I challenge you as honest men whether our proclamations and prayers in the past have not been in behalf of life and liberty and law, no matter who was benefited by it. But there are things taking place that make us feel that the old sentiments are not dying out, as they ought to have died out. I think that this country would have more confidence in you than it has to-day if the flag of a common country had been permitted to wave at the recent Virginia celebration, rather than to have had the stars and bars far out number it.

Let us be candid about this, gentlemen. These things can not longer exist in this country. The stars and the bars can not be worshiped in this land any more and ought not to be flaunted in the face of any citizen. I say to you, my fellow-citizens, that you can not afford to mass in serried columns men in gray uniforms as you have just done in this country. It is not needed. In saying this I do not ask you, I am not foolish enough, or blind enough, or weak enough to ask you to forget the tender relations that existed between you and your comrades in the past. That, no man asks or desires. I could not ask any gentleman to forget the men that fell fighting by his side in a common cause, whether the cause was right or wrong. I do not appeal for that. There is much that you can do, and can see and feel, to which I will respond "Amen" or be silent. But I must enter my earnest and solemn protest against being told that we need a new North, when the relics of the dangerous South are yet flaunted in the face of the Republic. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I have oftentimes listened with more than rapture to the eloquent words that have fallen from the lips of that representative of old Erin who honors this House with his presence; but it pained me this morning to hear the eloquent gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McADOO] shout "Liberty, liberty, liberty!" to rally the voters on both sides of this Chamber against the passage of a law which only seeks that liberty may live in this country. I could not but think of the words of Edmund Burke when my friend made his eloquent peroration:

My rigor relents. I pardon something to the spirit of liberty.

My feelings take that charitable form for a moment.

But then I could not but feel that poor, blind John Milton anticipated the rallying cry of the gentleman from New Jersey when he said:

License they mean when they cry liberty.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

And he again reminded me of the last words of Madame Roland, when on the scaffold she cried:

O Liberty! Liberty! how many crimes are committed in thy name!

[Applause on the Republican side.]

Ah, gentlemen, you may cry liberty, but in the States whence many of you come the words of Goldsmith, whom my friend of pure Celtic blood should reverence, the great author of "The Deserted Village" and other beautiful themes that reach the hearts of the poor, whether black or white, are but too true:

Laws grind the poor and rich men rule the few.

That is the liberty that you, my eloquent friend, appeal for at this hour when you oppose this bill.

In conclusion, I will quote the Scottish bard in connection with the efforts to pass this law; I mean that simple bard whose heart never failed to beat for the poor, Bobby Burns. He said, anticipating this contest for liberty and law:

Liberty's in every blow!
Let us do or die.

It was appropriate then, it is as appropriate now as on the field of Bannockburn. I thank my friend for that apostrophe to liberty, but I am reminded that it seems much like Satan wearing the cross when he seeks to promulgate the dark dogmas of hell. [Applause on the Republican side.]

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I call up for present consideration a conference report on the post-office appropriation bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9856) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1 and 4.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 3, 5, and 6.

Amendment numbered 2: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$7,390,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

HENRY H. BINGHAM,
J. H. KETCHAM,
JAS. H. BLOUNT,
Managers on the part of the House,
W. B. ALLISON,
J. C. S. BLACKBURN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

During the reading of the report the following occurred:

Mr. McMILLIN. I ask my friend from Pennsylvania if he can not withhold that report. The time is so limited for general debate that a number of gentlemen will be cut off if that is considered now.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to state to the gentleman that I am of opinion that the report will take but a very few moments.

Mr. McMILLIN. We had that statement yesterday.

Mr. BINGHAM. There were two points of disagreement. This is the agreement of the two Houses on that disagreement.

Mr. McMILLIN. We had the statement made yesterday afternoon that a report would only take a few minutes, and yet it took all the afternoon. I know under the rule this can be done, but at the same time, in justice to gentlemen who will have no opportunity to speak by reason of it, I hope that it may be deferred.

Mr. BINGHAM. It will take but a few moments.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is it in order to raise the question of consideration on this? It is in the power of the House not to consider it, is it not?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PETERS in the chair). After the reading of the report that question can be raised.

Mr. BINGHAM. The special order permits the consideration of general appropriation bills.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. The special order permits it, but the House has the right to refuse to consider it.

The Clerk then finished the reading of the conference report as above set forth.

Mr. BINGHAM. The statement is very brief and I ask that it may be read.

Mr. BLOUNT. I suggest that the reading of it be dispensed with and I suggest my friend can state it more briefly.

The statement is as follows:

[Report of the managers on the part of the House, to accompany House bill 9856.]

The managers on the part of the House of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9856) making appropriation for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, submit the following statement as to the effect of the recommendations of the conference report.

The Senate recedes as to No. 1, increasing the appropriation for mail depredations and post-office inspectors and fees to the United States marshals, attorneys, and the necessary incidental expenses connected therewith, from $250,000 to $300,000.

The House recedes as to No. 2, increasing the appropriation for compensation to clerks in post-offices from $7,300,000 to $7,500,000 and agrees to insert in lieu of the sum proposed by the Senate $7,390,000.

The House recedes from No. 3, to correct verbal error, using the word "this" in lieu of the word "that."

The Senate recedes as to No. 4, and agrees to the item for mail locks and keys, $50,000, as recommended by the House.

The House recedes from No. 5, and strikes out 664 and inserts 712, so that the item for transportation of foreign mails will read $712,000.

The House recedes from No. 6, and after "dollars" inserts "and from this appropriation the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to expend the sum of $48,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to cover one-half of the cost of transportation, compensation, and expense of clerks to be employed in assorting and pouching mails in transit on steam-ships between the United States and other postal administrations in the International Postal Union."

HENRY H. BINGHAM,
J. H. KETCHAM,
JAMES H. BLOUNT.

Mr. BINGHAM. If there is no objection I will explain the disagreement on the first amendment. The Senate added $50,000 to the item of "mail depredations and attorneys' fees." They receded from that amendment and accepted the figures contained in the House bill. The second point is simply in the changing of the word "this" to "that," a mere verbal change. The third point was the recession on the part of the Senate from the amendment reducing the item of mail locks and keys from "$50,000" to "$30,000." They adopt the recommendation of the House making that item $50,000. The main point of disagreement involving a large sum of money was the appropriation for clerks in the post-offices. The House recommended an appropriation of $7,300,000. The Senate added to the appropriation $390,000. The agreement made by the conferees reduced that item $200,000 from the Senate amount and increased the item as recommended by the House $190,000.

The feature of new legislation in connection with the bill is the last item, wherein an amendment to this effect has been added to the bill:

Increasing the item for foreign mail transportation $48,000, to be used in the following manner: Out of which appropriation the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to expend the sum of $48,000 or as much thereof as may be necessary to cover one-half of the cost of transportation, compensation, and expense of clerks to be employed in assorting and pouching mails in transit in steam-ships between the United States and other postal administrations in the International Postal Union.

The purpose is that when steam-ships transmitting or carrying our foreign mails arrive at the port of New York by virtue of the location of that service of the postal agent these great mails will be completely distributed, so that they can be immediately dispatched to all sections of the country, and the delay that is now so common in the great central post-office of New York in the distribution of the large foreign mails would be obviated and the mails facilitated by at least from twenty-four to thirty-six hours in being sent to all sections of the country. It is a proposition to carry into effect the same character of distribution that is now employed in what we call the railway postal service, and it is regarded as a wise and economical measure, for the reason that the great business centers of the country will receive their large foreign mails at so much earlier a day and hour than they now receive them. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

I move the previous question on the adoption of the report.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the report of the committee of conference was adopted.

Mr. BINGHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FEDERAL ELECTION BILL.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the minority of the committee from which this bill was reported and under the usual custom of the House, I would occupy or might occupy the floor for an hour; but I desire to proceed to assign out of my own time twenty minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. EWART].

Mr. EWART. Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of deep regret that a stern sense of duty compels me to antagonize a proposition which a large majority of the political party to which I belong are committed and have formally indorsed as a party measure. I am well aware of the penalty I shall have to pay in opposing this measure. Unfortunately, it has reached that point in American politics where, under the iron and despotic ruling of King Caucus, a Representative of the people is often forced to forget that he has a conscience and, blindly ignoring all sense of self-respect and manly pride, commit himself to the support of measures which deep down in his heart he knows to be utterly wrong.

We often hear of the nerve and boldness of politicians. That is a mere figure of speech; a flight of the imagination. As a rule, the politician is an arrant coward, and rarely ever possesses the courage of his convictions. His good sense, his cool judgment, his conscience, if he has any, may all condemn the measure under consideration, but the crack of the party lash generally brings him cowering and whimpering to the feet of the master to do his bidding. We need not go far to illustrate what I mean. To-day, to our shame and discredit be it said, there are Representatives from sovereign States upon this floor who deep down in their hearts know that this election bill is as damnable, illogical, inequitable, and vicious a piece of legislation as was ever attempted to be placed upon the statute-books of this Republic. [Applause.] And yet, at a sacrifice of their manhood, sober judgment, their sense of fairness and justice, feeling the keen sting of the caucus lash, they will support a measure which will add untold miseries to the woes of the unfortunate people it is designed to help, stir up race troubles and factional strife in our fair South land, and breed political confusion worse confounded.

I do not know the distinguished authors of this bill. Perhaps the most distinguished, the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], I know has achieved great reputation as a civil-service reformer. In that respect I concede that he is a grand and glittering success. He can indulge in more lofty declamation on the beauties of civil-service reform and at the same time secure more patronage for his political henchmen and retainers than any member of the Massachusetts delegation, and that is saying a great deal. [Laughter and applause.] But, however great a success he may be in the line of civil-service reform, as a statesman, if this piece of legislation is a fair criterion of his work, he is a most profound failure.

The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts has been, I am told, an extensive traveler. He has viewed the splendors of sunrise as it fell on mountain and cliff and glacier from the summit of Mont Blanc, he has placed his footsteps in those of Hannibal and Napoleon along the historic St. Bernard Pass, he has seen the gondolier life at Venice, the peasant life of modern Greece, the life of the lazzaretto and the nobility in Florence and Rome; in a word, there is little of scenic splendor, of historic, social, or political interest in the Old World which he has not compelled to yield tribute to enrich his store of knowledge of men and of things. But, like many Americans, he has failed to see the loveliest part of his own country, the territory south of Mason and Dixon's line. Had the distinguished gentleman ever been South, had he ever had an opportunity to see our people, to study the political situation there, to realize the immensity of the social and political questions that confront them, he would not to-day be advocating the passage of a law which will postpone the settlement of those grave questions for long years to come and alienate the people of the two great sections of our common country.

But, as the distinguished gentleman has never embraced the opportunity to visit the coming "El Dorado of American adventure," let him at least come with me in his imagination and look at the South as it was in 1865 and as it is to-day. The close of the most disastrous war in the history of the world found the South in a condition that words are powerless to describe. Blackened chimneys, with women and children crying for bread in the ruins of their homes, marked the path of the victorious Union army. Cities and towns were desolated, fields devastated and destroyed, and hundreds of millions of dollars invested in slaves wiped out of existence. Bankruptcy and ruin stared the people in the face. As the victorious legions of the Union Army, amidst the thunder of artillery and the plaudits of the patriotic multitude, marched through the streets of the national Capital the ragged and foot-sore Confederate was wondering where to get bread for his wife and little ones as he looked on his ruined and devastated home.

But, nothing daunted, the Southerner went to work, and by indomitable pluck and energy was soon on his feet again. The losses incurred by the South in the late war are almost incalculable. It is stated that the actual loss from the war aggregated $5,000,000,000. In 1880 the total amount of capital invested in manufacturing enterprises in the United States was $2,700,000,000. If every manufacturing enterprise in the United States had been wiped out of existence by some great calamity the loss would only have been half as great as the losses entailed upon the South by the late war. On the heels of this fearful loss by war and destruction of values came political misrule and degradation, against which it seemed almost hopeless to strive.

The State governments fell into the hands of the most disreputable gang of thieves and plunderers that ever disgraced a nation, and the very name of Republicanism became a stench in the nostrils of all honest men. By bloodshed, violence, and intimidation these governments were wrested from the thieves and plunderers and to-day without exception are held by the Democratic party. In spite of this long era of misrule and all the evils of reconstruction the South has prospered as never a section prospered before. Go South now, and your journey will be through a continuous and unbroken strain of the music of progress, the whirr of the spindle, the buzz of the saw, the roar of the furnace, and the throb of the locomotive. The next census will show it to be the richest section of our country.

Let me briefly submit a few statements as to the wonderful increase of wealth in the South in the past nine years. In 1880 the total wealth of the South was $2,913,436,000. In 1889 it is estimated at $4,220,166,000, an increase of $1,306,000,000. The assessed value of property in the South is about 31 per cent. of its true value. On this basis the increase has in reality been $3,000,000,000 in nine years. In ten years the South had increased its iron output from 397,301 tons to 1,566,702 tons. The percentage of increase has been 294 in the South and 78 in the rest of the country. In 1882 the South produced 6,569,316 tons of coal; in 1889, 19,497,418 tons. The year 1890 will show an increase of over 22,000,000 tons.

Since 1865 the South has produced and sold $3,000,000,000 worth of cotton. With 161 cotton mills in the year 1880, having 687,854 spindles and 323 looms, this industry has increased till the South possesses to-day over 400 mills, with over 2,250,000 spindles and 50,000 looms. The agricultural interests of the South have also marvelously increased. From 3,000,000 bales of cotton in 1870 the yield in the South advanced to 7,250,000 in 1889. Its corn production for the same period shows a gain of 270,000,000 bushels. In wheat there is an increase of 22,000,000; in oats, of 45,000,000 bushels. Comparing it with the production of the rest of the country, we find that, notwithstanding the fact that the West produced last year the largest crop of corn ever made, the increase as compared with 1879 was only 31 per cent., while that of the South's corn crop was 55 per cent.

When we consider the poverty of the South at the start and the lack of immigration and contrast it with the wealth of the North and West this agricultural progress of the South is astonishing. It is a monument to the energy of the people and a complete refutation of the statement that the people of that section devote their entire time to hunting down and shooting the colored men of the South, who constitute in the main the labor that harvests this immense crop. The magnitude of the investments in Southern railroads since the 1st of January, 1880, is almost beyond comprehension. In 1880 the total mileage of the country was 93,296 miles, and of this 20,562 miles, or 20 per cent., were in the South, while in 1889 the South has 40,520 miles out of a total of 161,270 miles, or 25 per cent. Her foreign commerce has increased over $66,958,738 in nine years.

The South leads the nation in the rate of increase in national banking. Since 1879 the increase in the number of banks has been 13 per cent. in the North, 81 per cent. in the West, and 113 per cent. in the South, whilst the increase in the capital stock was nearly 4 per cent. in the North, 95 per cent. in the West, and 70 per cent. in the South. In manufacturing enterprises, in the last four years, we have established over fourteen thousand, and the list is daily increasing. In this prosperity the blacks, to a very great extent, have shared with the whites. They pay taxes on over $400,000,000 of property in the Southern States, and are making marvelous and rapid improvements in their financial, social, and moral condition. Their legal rights in the main are jealously protected, except in a few sections of the South where ignorance and brute force unite in refusing to the negro such rights as he is entitled to under the Constitution and laws of our land.

As to his political rights, speaking for my own State, I unhesitatingly assert that no Republican in the State, black or white, is prevented from casting his vote. The elections are absolutely fair. [Applause.] Here and there, as is the case in perhaps any State in the Union, local returning boards assume to throw out certain precincts for alleged irregularities, and in that way often wrongs are done. Representatives from other States can speak for their own sections; I only speak positively for my own. It has been alleged that grave frauds were perpetrated in the Second district, and yet it is a fact that the United States courts in that district have just adjourned without finding a single bill of indictment. It is proper that I should state that both the judge and district attorney are Republicans. In other States in the South the negro vote is suppressed under the forms of law, and in other sections still there is violence and stealing of ballot-boxes.

The United States Senate for the past twelve years has openly proclaimed to the people of the United States that they place no credence in the allegation that elections in the South are fraudulent. Why do I make this statement? Almost every year they have seated, without protest or question, United States Senators elected by Democratic legislators in the South. If the Congressional elections in the South are tainted with fraud, the election of members to the State Legislatures, who elect these Senators, are equally vitiated. The Republican majority, in allowing these Senators to take their seats without questioning their right or title to the same, have either committed a grave wrong against their own conscience, or tacitly admit by their action that there is no truth in the allegation of Southern election frauds and outrages.

I am not going to exonerate the white race of the South from all blame in this matter. There are bad and murderous men in certain sections of the South who hate the negro, and whenever opportunity offers they wreak their vengeance upon him. Sometimes they are severely punished, sometimes they are not. But, because a few lawless men from time to time commit crime, should the entire people of the South be blamed for it and be stigmatized as the sympathizers of a band of assassins and murderers?

The negro citizen of 1890 differs from the negro citizen of 1865 in many important essentials. He is better educated, more self-reliant, has more property, and is better qualified to think and act for himself. The negro is imitative. If a white man buys a horse the negro buys a horse; if a white man paints his house white with green blinds the negro paints his house white with green blinds; if the white man sends his children to school the negro sends his children to school; if the white man finds it necessary to protect his rights at the ballot-box the negro will sooner or later do the same thing.

The negro to-day is thinking for himself. He is entitled to all kindness and consideration at the hands of the Southern man. In the late war, when the men were at the front and the enemy was within Southern borders, it was the faithful negro who stood as a body-guard to defend the mistress of the mansion. For their faithfulness, constancy, and patience during those four years the Southern people owe the negro a debt they can never repay. Brave and honorable men will treat them with kindness and justice. It is only the ingrate and coward who will persecute and maltreat the faithful and inoffensive black man of the South.

I am sick and tired of this talk about the negro problem at the South. There is no negro problem at the South. It is no new question there. It is the same question that existed when the shackles were struck off the limbs of four millions of slaves; it is the same question that existed in 1865, when nearly one million slaves were given the right of suffrage. It is not a problem. Side by side the blacks have been there with the whites since the war, and side by side they will be with them until the last syllable of recorded time. [Applause.]

I know the negro. I ought to know more about him than the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts. For three generations my people were slave-owners. There are no more faithful, generous, or kind-hearted people upon God's green earth. Give them the education that they are so eagerly striving to obtain, and the country will have no more useful class of citizens than they will prove to be. But instill into their minds that the white people of the South are their enemies, that they desire to crush them, to strip them of their legal rights, and you do the negro a wrong that you can never atone for. I say that the negro is to-day thinking for himself. It is a delusion to suppose that he is voting the Republican ticket solidly. He is doing nothing of the kind. Thousands of them to-day are voting the Democratic ticket as willingly and as openly as the Republican ticket is voted by myself or any of my colleagues on this floor.

It is getting more and more difficult every year for the Republican party to control him. Thousands, as I have stated, openly vote the Democratic ticket. Thousands do not manifest interest enough in an election to go to the polls. He is growing skeptical about certain pledges and promises which have been made and broken by the political organization to which for so many years he has shown his loyalty. Widespread dissatisfaction exists among the colored voters of the South to-day. There never was a proposition as dear to the negro heart as the Blair educational bill. The negro knows the power of education. He looked eagerly to the great Republican party to redeem in honor and good faith the pledge it had made in its platform at Chicago to extend national aid to the common-school system of the country.

When the news was flashed over the wires that the Republican party had won a great victory, that both the executive and legislative branches of the Government were in our hands, a mighty shout went up from the Republican hosts of the South. Knowing that the Republican Senate had three times passed the Blair educational bill, knowing that the President when a Senator had voted for the bill, knowing that with a Republican majority in the House its passage, unless obstructed by the Speaker, was a foregone conclusion, and fully realizing that the same great necessities existed to-day for the passage of the measure as existed ten years ago, the Republicans of the South confidently looked forward to the speedy redemption of the party's pledge.

Warned by the treatment given by CARLISLE in the Fiftieth Congress, Southern Republicans by their votes placed in the chair a Speaker for whom the assurance was positively given that there would be no such arbitrary and despotic treatment of the measure as had been given it by Speaker CARLISLE in the Fiftieth Congress. But the pledge so solemnly made in the Chicago platform has been wantonly and cruelly falsified. A Republican Senate has deliberately killed the educational bill. It was a blow that went straight to the negro heart and will not soon be forgotten nor forgiven. It was as cowardly an abandonment of principle as a great party was ever guilty of. The failure to pass that bill has caused wide dissatisfaction among the colored voters of the South.

Speaking for my own State, I can safely say that if the election was to take place to-morrow not three-tenths of the colored votes in the State would be cast for the nominees of the Republican party. Why was that great measure so ruthlessly slaughtered in the Senate? The excuse rendered by certain Senators is that it was no longer a necessity. No longer a necessity? Why not? Because it is said the Southern State Democratic governments were doing what that Senate did not have the magnanimity and courage to do, appropriating ample funds for the education of the negro in the South, thereby elevating him to a higher plane, teaching him the great duties of citizenship and enabling him to protect his rights at the ballot-box. The defeat of that measure must have been intended as a formal notice to the country that the Republicans of that body attach no importance to the statement that the negro was maltreated in the South, deprived of his political rights and kept in ignorance by the dominant party for political purposes.

Perhaps the reason was correctly given by a distinguished Senator who, in reply to the statement of a Southern Republican Representative that the negroes would resent their action in defeating the bill at the next election, coolly replied that they might do so and "go to the devil," as they were of no use to the Republican party anyhow. It matters not, however, what brought about the defeat of the bill. I simply assert that the negro regards it as a cowardly abandonment of his interests. It has no parallel except in 1876, when Hayes, with the full assent of the party leaders, left him to his fate in order to secure the Presidency for the Republican party.

Perhaps the defeat of this bill, after all, may prove a blessing in disguise. If it tends to disintegrate the blacks of the South, if it teaches them the fallacy of depending on the hypocritical promises of political parties who wish their votes only, if it drives thousands of them into the Democratic party and breaks up the solidity of the black vote, then comes inevitably the breaking up of the white vote of the South. There are thousands of men in the South to-day who are protectionists at heart who would identify themselves with the Republican party to-day but for the scarecrow of negro supremacy and negro domination.

Every year the Republican party in the States of Tennessee, North Carolina, and the two Virginias is becoming stronger and more aggressive. It is not acquiring this strength by making morbid appeals to the negro and by exciting their passions and prejudices, but by appealing to the sober judgment of the white voters of the South on the great issue of protection to home industries and home labor. Disorganization prevails in the Democratic ranks in almost every State in the South. I send to the Clerk's desk to have read extracts from the Wilmington Messenger, one of the leading Democratic papers in the South:

While these infernal machinations are active against the rights, privileges, and liberties of the Southern whites there are sad indications of disorder and disintegration in North Carolina and other Southern States among the whites. We can not understand this. What can men expect but ruin and trouble if the whites split up among themselves? In union there are strength and victory, but in tumult and division there are weakness and defeat.

In Georgia there are two men, both professing Democracy, running for governor—Hardeman and Northen. If a strong Republican should run he might go in. In South Carolina the split in the Democracy seems wide and complete. We do not understand what possesses the whites. Have they so soon forgotten the sad lessons of reconstruction and the wholesale plunderings of the dark days?

The Farmers' Alliance is becoming a great political power in that section. No longer frightened at the Bourbon scarecrow of negro supremacy, they are boldly announcing that they will no longer tolerate ring rule, and with thorough organization and well-defined principles they propose to take an active interest in the campaign this fall. In my own State they will undoubtedly control the next Legislature and send their nominee to the United States Senate. With every indication, then, pointing to the breaking up of the solid South, when party lines are being obliterated, when the gigantic industrial interests of the South are daily winning over converts to the great doctrine of protection, when the best of feeling exists between the great sections of our grand Republic, there appears upon the scene the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, who, with a coterie of politicians, insists upon driving through this House a law that will destroy this good feeling and make Republican success at the South in the future an absolute impossibility.

I do not pretend, Mr. Speaker, to question the power of this Congress to pass a bill regulating the Federal elections of this Government. In my opinion it has ample power under the Constitution to do so. But, Mr. Speaker, this proposition is not a broad, comprehensive, and statesmanlike one, to take entire control and supervision of national elections, as this Congress undoubtedly has a right to do, but is a lame and impotent effort to patch up a system of double-headed jurisdiction, a system of legislation which has always been a failure and always will be a failure. It ordains irregularity instead of certainty. It is not uniform. Scores of members on this floor would not dare to invoke the aid of this law in their districts. It would awaken a storm of indignation that would sweep them out of political existence. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It is a sectional measure, designed almost entirely for the South. It is a sort of legislation which can only be characterized as that of the spotted hit or miss, fly-trap order. How is the law to be applied in those districts where, for the sake of argument, fraud prevails and it is necessary to apply it? The applicants for supervision must declare their belief that without it there will not be a free and fair election. And here we have a direct appeal to partisan prejudice. The complaint is filed that the majority in the district propose to steal, cheat, and swindle at the ballot-box and that Federal supervisors must be appointed to protect the rights of the minority. And right here the wickedness and folly of this proposition become manifest. The most determined and resolute body of partisans in the world to-day live at the South.

By this law you instigate the misguided colored man to sign the petition in which he alleges that the white people of his district propose to cheat and swindle him at the ballot-box. At the very outset of the political contest distrust and bad blood are generated. But it does not stop here. The law directs that the supervisors shall be appointed from each political party. In many counties in certain Southern States there are not half a dozen white Republicans; in many townships not a single one. Who, then, will be appointed supervisors? Necessarily negroes. Deputy marshals would also be appointed from the same class. What results would this bring about? Bloodshed, terrorism, riot, and disorder.

I do not mean that this state of affairs would be universal. It would probably prevail in those districts where the black majorities are overwhelming, and where it would be impossible to get white men of sufficient nerve and courage to act as supervisors of the election. Did it ever occur to the framers of this bill that they are asking these poor negroes, who are appointed in Mississippi, Louisiana, South Carolina, Alabama, and Georgia as supervisors, to discharge a duty that the bravest soldier in the United States service to-day would hesitate to perform? [Applause.] Did it ever strike these gentlemen that it required a man of unflinching nerve to act as a supervisor or deputy marshal at a precinct surrounded by angry, hot-blooded, determined, and resolute partisans where the issue is black against white, the powerful against the weak, the rich against the poor, the intelligent against the ignorant?

You will probably exclaim with virtuous indignation that this is a shameless state of affairs to exist in any section of the United States. But, virtuous Representatives, put yourselves in the place of these Southern people, place negro judges of election and negro deputy marshals at the voting precincts in Michigan, in Wisconsin, in Ohio, and in Indiana, and the Republican nominees for Congress in those districts would be swept out of political existence. You very well know that you would not dare to apply this law as it will have to be applied in the South in the districts which you represent to-day.

Suppose you place this law upon the statute-books, in what way have you helped the negro? You again solidify the white voters of the South, now on the eve of disintegration; you again solidify the black vote, thus entirely destroying the kindly relations which exist between the two races to-day; you encourage Bourbon extremists to enact legislation which will practically disfranchise thousands of Republicans, who now have the right to vote, by legislation which will stand the constitutional tests in the courts of the State where they are enacted. You frighten away Northern capital now pouring into the South. You retard our industrial interests, and all to do what? To create returning boards who may possibly return as elected a few Congressmen from the black districts.

I say possibly. My honest belief is that if you pass this law not a corporal's guard of Southern Republicans will be on this floor in the Fifty-second Congress. You say that it is a scandal to the nation that these frauds are committed in the South, and that they ought to be stopped. I agree with you. But you must remember one thing. This Government does not exist to save the negro from the struggle for his rights. My rights are not protected by the United States Government, but by the State of which I am a citizen, by the laws of that State, and more especially by my own capacity, my education, my ability to protect my rights at the ballot-box.

My State has, in the fourth judicial district, a negro solicitor, the State's attorney—elected by a majority of the voters of that district, an able and capable lawyer. Have you, gentlemen of the North, ever elected a negro prosecuting attorney in any of your districts?

My State sends a colored Congressman to the Fifty-first Congress, an able, capable, and faithful Representative. Where are the colored Congressmen from the North?

How many negro postmasters are there in the States of Maine, Michigan, Iowa, and Illinois?

You may mourn over the wrongs of the negro, you may deplore them. No doubt he is as dear to you as the ruddy drops that visit your sad hearts, but I would be glad to see you exhibit a little more practical sympathy and less sentimental gush in his behalf. You will tell me that I am suggesting no remedy for the political state of affairs in the South. Yes, there is a remedy, and that is to mind your own affairs and treat the colored man of the South with "wise and salutary neglect." I mean, of course, in a political sense. If you are too penurious to help him by educating him, at least let him alone. It was Burke who said that "a clamor made merely for the purpose of rendering the people discontented without an endeavor to give them a practical remedy is indeed one of the worst acts of sedition." Such conduct is worthy only of demagogues like Cleon or scheming politicians like Burr. I am tired of this rot and fustian about the poor negro and down-trod Republican of the South. The negro of the South is doing well.

Do not let the Southern Republican party have the epitaph of the Italian—"I was well. I wanted to feel better. I took physic, and here I am." [Laughter.] The Republican of the South is doing well. We came here from North Carolina with as many Republican Representatives as the great State of Indiana has in Congress to-day. [Loud laughter and applause.] The votes of Southern Representatives made it possible for you to organize this House. We will continue to increase our numbers if you will let us alone. Perhaps in the near future, when we come here with fifty Southern Republican Representatives, we may be able to secure a committee of a little more importance than that of the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department. [Laughter.]

There is much that you could do for us, if you would, of infinitely more value from a political standpoint than the enactment of a Federal election law. You could give us legislation that would gain more votes for the Republican party South and increase our representation here than all the Federal election laws you could pass from now till doomsday. You might pass a law granting aid to the common-school system of the country. If you are afraid the Democratic State governments will steal the funds, let a Federal board of education disburse it; no matter how it comes, educate the poor negro in the South, educate the poor white man in the South, then you elevate him, you teach him the duties of citizenship. When you do that you can rely upon it he will be amply able to take care of himself at the ballot-box. You say that this will take too long a time. Better let it take time than pass a law which will delay it indefinitely, bring about bloodshed, sadden many a heart, desolate many a home, and breed inextinguishable confusion all over the country. Let these distinguished gentlemen, who mourn over the woes of the negro and indirectly instigate murder and arson by wondering at the patience and long-suffering of the persecuted negro of the South and then coolly and cruelly vote down the only proposition that was ever introduced in the American Congress to enable him to protect himself from the persecution of his enemies, cease their clamor. There is still another way you may help the Republicans of the South. The only agricultural product that is taxed to-day is tobacco, almost entirely a Southern product. In the platform at Chicago the party is pledged to repeal that tax.

The whole system of internal-revenue taxation ought to be stricken from our statute-books. In many sections of our country it is a law that has to be enforced in the blood and suffering of our people. I have known a poor mountaineer dragged from his home and little ones a hundred miles away, tried and convicted by a Federal court, and thrown into a filthy jail for selling a little piece of twisted tobacco, the product of his little hill-side home. Scores upon scores of lives have been lost in the enforcement of this law, and still to the shame and degradation of the American people it remains upon our statute-books. The national Prohibition party demand its repeal; the Woman's Christian Temperance Union have, time and again, asked Congress to strike the odious law from our statute-books; the national platform at Chicago distinctly asserts that it will abandon the entire system of internal-revenue taxation before it will interfere with the American protection system. In politics, as in business, honesty is the best policy. You have given us scant measure of relief in the McKinley tariff bill.

The Senate, in utter contempt of the platform in Chicago, has stricken the provision from the McKinley bill relieving the growers of tobacco from the onerous and inquisitorial features of the law. Another cowardly abandonment of principle, another broken pledge to Southern Representatives! We asked you for relief from this great burden imposed upon our people. You turn a deaf ear to our requests. We ask bread, you have given us a stone; we ask fish, you have thrown us a serpent in the shape of a Federal election law. There is still another way in which you may assist us. Whisper into the ear of your Chief Executive, for Southern Republicans have no representative in his Cabinet with whom we can advise, that when he appoints district attorneys in the South to appoint men who are not afraid to avow their Republicanism and who have nerve and backbone enough to do their whole duty. [Applause on the Republican side.]

We have laws enough on the statute-books to-day if they were enforced as they ought to be. But you will never have them enforced with weaklings as district attorneys. Suppose you pass this law. In all probability your first test case would be in the State of South Carolina. You have a district attorney in that State appointed by this Administration who has not the nerve of a buck rabbit, and would require proof as strong as holy writ before he would send a bill of indictment against a South Carolina red-shirt ballot-box-stuffer. [Laughter.]

In other States in the South you have district attorneys who actually did not have the moral courage to vote the Republican ticket at the last election.

Do you suppose for a moment that you could induce a district attorney who actually did not have backbone enough to go the polls and vote to prosecute a set of desperate violators of this election law? These are measures of relief which, if accorded to the Republicans of the South, would gradually and eventually break up the solid South, and are worth more to Southern Republicans than all the national election laws you can pile upon your statute-books. Southern Republicans are not demanding the passage of this measure. The able and distinguished gentleman from Louisiana, Mr. COLEMAN, stands with me in bitter opposition to it. There are other Southern Republicans who are known to be opposed to it and who will vote against it; others there are still who, though impelled by party considerations to vote for the measure, know that it is an unwise and impolitic one. I have the satisfaction of knowing that the best element of my party in North Carolina heartily indorse my course in this matter, and that my district is almost solidly against this bill. I have a letter on the subject from one of the leading Republicans in my State. He says:

I heartily indorse your course on the Lodge election bill. I consider the policy of such a law at this time as very vicious, because, in this State at least, there is great apathy among the negroes, some avowing their intention of voting the Democratic ticket, and many more saying that they will not vote at all. The natural result of this state of things with the blacks is to produce an independent feeling and expression among the whites, so that it is now far from an uncommon thing to hear white men of position declare that they will no longer be led by the nose in political matters. The passage of an election law would have the tendency to reset the negro in his former party allegiance and rekindle the passions of the white man, thus making it possible for the Democrats to enforce the Payne election law all over this State. I hope you will be able to impress your views with sufficient force to convince our friends North that the passage of such a bill, unless enforced by an army, which no man dreams of or desires, will be brutum fulmen, and can only result in perpetuating the present state of ill-feeling and party prejudice in the South, which now shows such evident signs of abating.

One of the most prominent colored men in my district, and a leader of his people, earnestly indorses my views on the election bill and predicts trouble and disaster to his race if it passes. John H. Williamson, the editor of the Gazette, the leading colored paper in the State, and an ex-member of ability and standing in the Legislature of 1886, writes me that he heartily approves my course and unites with me in warning the leaders of the party against this pernicious legislation. With the exception of that variety of Southern Republicans who desire to see only a skeleton Republican party in the South, in order that the area of official availability may be as limited as possible, I have the hearty indorsement of my party in opposing this measure. [Applause.] But if I did not, Mr. Speaker, it would not have affected my action in this matter. Whilst I may have politically sacrificed myself here, I have the proud satisfaction of knowing that I have done my duty, and having done that, in possession of a "peace within me that exceeds all earthly dignities, a still and quiet conscience." I am a Republican, a Southern Republican. Born and bred in the hot-bed of secession, and disunion, the city of Columbia, I well recollect when as a lad I stood upon the streets of that city and cheered those who were nearest and dearest to me as they marched to their deaths upon the bloody fields of Gettysburgh and Shiloh. Almost every one of my blood perished in that struggle. They were brave and honorable men who fought for what they conceived to be a great principle, and I have no apologies or excuses to render in their behalf. Standing upon the threshold of manhood, I chose to identify myself with the Republican party because I believed it to be the party of progress, of right, and of justice.

My first vote was cast for that brave soldier and magnanimous President, Ulysses S. Grant, who, if he were here to-day, would discountenance and frown upon this measure. [Applause.] I know what it is to be a Republican in the South. I have passed through the ordeal and I know what a fiery one it is. Ten years ago I made a campaign as elector on the Hayes and Wheeler ticket with pistol in hip-pocket, never knowing the moment when I would be required to use it. I have had the mournful pleasure of gazing upon my grave and reading my own epitaph! But, thank God, all that is changed now. I represent a district to-day that has a majority of white Republicans, in the ranks of which are our bravest young men, our largest tax-payers, and our best people. This political change has not been wrought by appeals to passion or prejudice, but to the cool, sober sense of the people. Northern capital is pouring into the district, and the next census will show it to be the richest in the State.

I do not desire to check this prosperity by voting for legislation that will prove inimical to their best interests. I do not know what course other Southern Republican Representatives may take in this matter; but, speaking for myself, I will never by my vote or voice support a proposition that tends to humiliate or degrade my people. I shall, if I am the only Republican on this floor, protest against the passage of a law that will sow the foul seeds of factional discord among the people, be a fruitful cause of unutterable woe to the unfortunate class it is designed to benefit. If that be treason to the party to which I have ever been loyal, make the most of it.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Speaker, in the limited period of time which I have assigned to myself for speaking upon this bill it will be impossible for me to go over all the several points which concern the merits of the bill, as distinguished from the political aspects which have been presented in the general debate. But the views held by me and other members of the minority of the committee which reported this bill have been succinctly set forth in the minority report which we made, and in which, seriatim, we stated the leading objections to this measure, concluding with a brief examination of the question of the power in Congress to enact it. To that report I must refer gentlemen in the House, and citizens outside of the House who may feel any interest in my opinions and views, for their clear, condensed, and honest expression.

Sir, we have had upon the statute-books of the United States certain laws passed some years since which I may describe as inspection laws—laws providing for observing and watching the popular elections in the several States for Representatives in Congress. Those acts were opposed when they were passed. In some particulars they are, as we find them recorded, open to just objection by one who approaches their consideration either from a legal or patriotic point of view. But, sir, those acts were modest in their terms and in their purpose. It was proposed by them to obtain from persons selected by the Government of the United States information about the registration of voters in the several States, and about the manner in which the elections were conducted by the officers selected by the States. Those were the main, apparent objects of the law, so far as the supervisors, as they are called, were concerned.

Those laws also provided for the appointment of deputy marshals to attend at the places of elections, to preserve order and to assist the supervisors in the performance of their duty, and both classes of appointees of the Government were put under liberal pay. The number of supervisors as fixed in those laws was two, one to be selected from each of the great political parties; whereas in this bill the number is three, two of whom shall be of the majority as represented by the circuit court of the United States at the place of appointment, and consequently it will effectively confer upon those two majority supervisors all the powers this bill contains with reference to registration and to the supervision of the election of members of Congress.

Now, it is well known that great abuses occur in the administration of these, comparatively speaking, modest and moderate laws. For instance, a great number of deputy marshals were appointed in the large cities, in many instances jail-birds, men who had served terms in prison. The roughs and rowdies of the cities who could exercise a certain amount of brute influence were appointed deputy marshals, and great expense resulted to the Government without any benefit. It was so in Philadelphia and elsewhere, and public opinion in Northern cities rose up against the administration of those laws. I know it was so in Philadelphia, and I believe it was so elsewhere, and the consequence was that Congress passed an act limiting the number of deputy marshals that could be employed at elections, an act which was proposed by the late Mr. Randall and now remaining upon the statute-book, but which this bill repeals. Public opinion operated upon that legislation and checked its mischief, so that we hear very little about it now. However, under those laws there is sufficient power to appoint persons representing the United States in every Southern city of the Union, and in every district where it can be pretended that inspection and supervision are needed or will be useful. Nobody is proposing to repeal those laws, yet they are not enforced.

Now, in every district that has been brought in question by a contested-election case at this session of Congress, and about which so much trouble has occurred, in every one of those election districts supervisors representing the United States can at least report whether these exaggerated stories that come to us with reference to the frauds and outrages of these elections are true or not. Why are not those laws put in operation at the South in places which fall within the description of the places for which they were made? I have come to the conclusion that the reason they are not resorted to is that a great part of the narratives that we hear about these matters are false, concocted by political zealots and for political purposes; and I observe that in the cases that come to us from our Elections Committee the spirit of partisanship outside which has brought most of the cases here appears in the reports of our committee. And then it becomes necessary also to back the reports up by political speeches on this floor. In every election case to the discussion of which I have listened we have had warm party appeals to vote for the reports of the committee. And I must here remark that in my opinion (with the exception of a case from the State of Maryland at the consideration of which I was not present) there has not been a single Southern election case decided by this House at this session the decision in which was lawfully made or was just.

Now, what is this bill? Why, sir, building upon the modest foundation of former laws, we are now asked to enact that these officials appointed by the United States, instead of watching, looking on, inspecting the elections to detect anything wrong and report it, are to be clothed in a large degree with a power to control the elections themselves. For the action of State officers in registration in receiving and rejecting votes and in making returns, for the State machinery applicable to all these objects, matured by State legislation and improved from time to time, is to be substituted this amazing, this crude, this partisan, this mischievous and dangerous bill. And, if I understand its source, it was not prepared nor was it brought to our notice by lawyers, or judges, or statesmen, or unprejudiced men of any description. It was, in many of its provisions, drawn by a professional politician. It was sanctioned, at least in form, by what is known in modern times as a caucus—a consultation of a section of the members of this House—and then sent to the committee, where it was impossible to consider it, and it was not considered except with reference to some amendments—not even read. Here it is in the House, and not one member in ten who now hears me has read the bill!

Sir, in the first place I object to the authority conferred upon the chief supervisor, or district supervisor as he is called in the report of the minority. He is to be appointed by a judge to administer this system, and he is to be one of the United States court commissioners now in office, until a vacancy occurs, when his successor may be selected. Observe, the bill is drawn to include and keep in office for the purposes of this bill the very man who has drawn a great portion of it—Davenport, of New York.

Now, that officer—the chief supervisor or district supervisor—appoints all the precinct supervisors, three in number, as I have already remarked. And they are under his orders, his bidding, made so by the bill. All the orders issued to them by him they are to obey, in regard to registration and naturalization matters as well as to the holding of elections and the making of the returns. And they are to hold a sort of side election in the same room with the State election officers, keeping a tally of the votes. What more? They are to make returns to him. They are his agents, not officers of the people or properly of the Government. They send their returns to him, and not returns only—for this bill says they shall send statements. They can write long cock-and-bull stories about the election, without the responsibility of an oath or an obligation of any sort. And this district supervisor makes a return as he pleases. With these papers before him he makes a return to the United States board of canvassers for the district, and those boards of canvassers make out the returns that are to be sent here to the Clerk of the House; and the Clerk of the House is to receive them and place the names thus returned upon the roll of the House, under pain of fine and imprisonment if he disobeys.

This is the scheme. And what does it all result in? The establishment of a most fearful, irresponsible one-man power in every Congressional district to which the bill is applied. The chief supervisor of elections stands at the central point of this machine, controlling in both directions; controlling on the one hand the appointees who attend to registration, naturalization, and the elections, making returns to him, and on the other the United States board of canvassers, because they must take his returns—they can do nothing else. The board of canvassers do not get returns from the State officers. They can resort to no external source of investigation. Why? Because they are merely ministerial officers; they have no judicial power. Their action is merely formal, unless the very return made to them be impeached for fraud. They are bound to take the returns, including the statements, if they please, which are sent to them by the district supervisor, who controls everything up to that point, and to make their returns in accordance with his report. And then the Clerk of this House, under fearful penalties, is bound to take their returns. He has no discretion; he can not listen to any imputation of fraud or mistake. And this House is to be packed upon returns made under a system which virtually puts the general supervisor of the district in control of the whole proceeding from beginning to end.

That statement, Mr. Speaker, is in itself an argument, and requires no illustration. Now, sir, why should these returns be made here as official at all? All the object of former inspection laws was to obtain information by United States officers in respect to proceedings on the part of State officers; and if this bill provided simply that these reports from the precinct supervisors should be sent to some general officer of the district authorized to send them here to the House, to be laid before the House when organized, there would be some common sense at least in the arrangement, whether there would be constitutional authority or wisdom in it or not.

But you have deliberately proposed an act of Congress providing for a new kind of return in addition to another kind of returns by the State officers; and the plan is to organize discord in this House and in the Government. I need not set forth or elaborate the consequences which will result from the conflicts of authority. Instead of seventeen contested-election cases, which I understand we have in this Congress at the present session, we may have fifty or more at future sessions, and the House will be turned upside down. The result will be infinite mischiefs and disgrace to the House itself, to say nothing of the injustice which will be perpetrated.

But the bill has another purpose, and that is to establish a large, a very large and expensive electioneering force in behalf of the party which, for the time being, may control these appointments of district supervisors. You have increased the number of supervisors at each election precinct from two to three. Well, there are 815 precincts in Philadelphia alone, and 4,217 in Pennsylvania. So that if the law were applied to that State, as it may be (because fifty or a hundred men in a district or city may invoke it, and that number of men may readily be found for such a purpose and set it in operation), there will be between 12,000 and 13,000 officers created in that one State alone, under pay, most of them at $5 or more per day, as well as an indefinite number of deputy marshals.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BUCKALEW. A few words further.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For how long a time?

Mr. FRANK. Say ten minutes.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Ten minutes is all I desire.

Mr. BLOUNT. Make the time indefinite.

Mr. BUCKALEW. No; I do not wish to deprive other members of the opportunity of being heard.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the gentleman from Pennsylvania asks an extension of ten minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCKALEW. There will be that number or more of deputy marshals, Mr. Speaker, as I have said, because the limitation upon the number is withdrawn, and this bill provides that the number appointed shall be the number agreed upon between the marshal of the district and the district supervisor. There is no limit at all except their discretion and choice. The Randall limitation upon that subject disappears absolutely, and extraordinary appointments of deputy marshals may be made without limit. The bill provides for that.

But what else does it do? Why, sir, the district supervisor selects one-third of the deputies that the marshal must appoint, and the marshal must appoint his selections. So you give to the district supervisor for the time being—you give him the actual power of appointment of one-third of the deputy-marshals, and charge them upon the Treasury of the Government. And, what is more, you provide in all cities of over 20,000 (and there are a large number of that class in my own State) that a canvass from house to house is to be made by the precinct supervisors, under the direction of their chief, and that deputy marshals shall assist in the canvass—the five-dollar-a-day boys.

An election precinct in Philadelphia, or in a town in that State of the population required, will be canvassed by supervisors and marshals, the number of the latter unlimited, all canvassers proceeding from house to house, under the direction of the district supervisor. They will take a list of the names of every voter, his residence, his age, the number of his house, and where he was born. They will go to all the boarding-houses, to all the corners of the cities and find every name, the nativity of every voter, his naturalization papers will be inspected, and his politics, of course, ascertained. And this list, accompanied by statements which these canvassers may write out—not in any legal form—are to be sent to the district supervisor a sufficient time before the election to enable him to have upon his table a perfect and complete representation of the voting population of the district, with all the minute particulars of each individual. In other words, the ordinary expenses of political parties, and the necessity for canvassing districts before the election to see about the voters, and to prepare for the election; all of the expenses for this work, the millions of dollars now borne by political parties is—as far as the one party is concerned, the one that controls these officers—to be transferred from the party and charged upon the Treasury of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In other words, official canvassing in the interest of the party in control at the time will supersede the necessity of individual contributions of money for such purpose; and when Mr. Wanamaker or some live ambitious person carries $400,000 in a campaign to the city of New York, it would not be necessary to expend any part of it in canvassing the State or the city of New York, or any other part of the country. That will be done at the expense of the United States, at the expense of all the people, say $10,000,000 a year, all furnished by the Government. Some of it may be expended for printing, some for expenses of a national committee, some for various other services in connection with the election, but the bulk can be applied to the ultimate object—the purchase of votes. [Renewed applause on the Democratic side.] All these things can be done, and your machinery provides a mode of doing it. This bill makes such purchase of votes safe and free, and why? Because you have three supervisors, representing the authority that appoints them, in sight of the election-room; they are spies upon every voter. The secrecy of the ballot is gone absolutely. In an election held in my own State the ticket of every voter is numbered when he votes. The ticket is taken and put into the box by the election officers.

Then at the end of the election the tickets, according to this bill, are to be examined, counted, and tallied by the supervisors, as well as by the election officers, and as the supervisors have kept a list of the voters with their numbers, they obtain complete knowledge how every elector has voted.

Why, in my State, although we have the ballots numbered, so that in case of a judicial investigation we can go to the box and pick out a certain number—when you prove that the man had no right to vote, you can pick out that ballot and destroy it, and purge the ballot-box—yet we swear our election officers that they will not divulge how a voter has cast his ballot. Our State election officers are under that obligation, and they keep it. If they do not, they are subject to speedy and sure punishment. By this bill you send your subordinates into every election precinct and into every election room, to destroy utterly the secrecy of the ballot; and yet the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who has the Australian system on the brain, almost, stands forward to report and support this bill. Mr. Speaker, these are the main objections to this bill. The "return" feature with all its evils, the enormous powers conferred upon the district election supervisors, and this enormous increase of popular election expenses throughout the country to be borne by the United States Treasury, these are the deadly evils which appear on the face of this bill; and those features of the bill which look to the destruction of the secret ballot and to the packing of juries in the United States courts are scarcely less objectionable and dangerous. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask that the gentleman from Pennsylvania be allowed to go on for ten minutes.

Unanimous consent was given.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Now, in a few words, I can state what is the existing plan of getting ballots into and out of an election box in my own State, and what is to be done with them afterward. Ever since 1839 we have chosen a judge and two inspectors of election in each precinct, and no voter can vote for more than one of the inspectors, so that they are divided politically, and then each inspector appoints a clerk, so that every election board in my State, from the Delaware to the Ohio, is constituted politically four to three, or three to four. And our example of 1839 has been followed in most of the American States; followed in part, at least. It is admirable, it is salutary, it is wise.

Then what more? We provide in all the cities for the protection of the polls by the police, for the preservation of order, for the arrest of any person committing violence.

Thus the conduct of elections is under municipal control, stringent and effectual. What else? Why, in our new constitution, which embodied the best thoughts of the best men of the State upon public affairs, we have a provision that any five citizens of an election district may apply to the court of common pleas having jurisdiction, setting forth that the appointment of overseers of elections (two in number) is a reasonable precaution against fraud at the election to be held, and the judges are obliged to appoint them; and in some of the rough districts in the outskirts of Philadelphia those appointments are applied for and made, and they can be made in other cities, made in the mining districts, made anywhere where any intelligent citizen apprehends their necessity. The supervisors, unlike those provided for in this bill, are to be citizens and electors of the district itself, owing some responsibility to their neighbors, acting under the observation of those that know them; and they are to be qualified voters of the election district, men of good moral character, and members of different parties. All this the court looks to and makes the appointments, and when the election board is divided in opinion respecting the receiving or rejecting of a vote, or about anything else in the performance of their duty, the overseers, if they are agreed, decide the question.

Now, sir, this is our electoral system in the State of Pennsylvania, in city and country, gradually worked out during the last fifty years, now largely embodied in the constitution of the State. Our mode of choosing inspectors is in the constitution itself.

Sir, there is no disorder in our State, from one end to the other, at elections. Nothing of importance occurs to disturb the peace. There are no frauds in our elections in Pennsylvania, from one end to the other, unless it is occasioned by something outside any common influence. The board may be imposed upon with reference to a single vote. But we have all the protection to the secrecy of the ballot, to the purity of the ballot, to the honesty of the election, to the fairness of the returns, that can be desired from imperfect human nature in the present state of society. Why are you sending this bill to that State? Where is your power to do it? Where is the justice of it? Why should we have 13,000 Federal appointees as supervisors, for no useful purpose whatever? Why should you pay that number or double that number of deputy marshals for no purpose except that they may be subsidized for election purposes in the interest of a party and the Federal Treasury pay the expense? Sir, I declare that this bill in its application to my State is utterly unnecessary and profligate, and my colleagues upon this floor (many of whom I am afraid act under a measure of duress on this subject) all know it as well as I do.

Now, if this power asserted by this bill were as ample as it is claimed to be under the Constitution, and I am not going to discuss that question because the time is too short; if this power were as ample as it is claimed to be—and it is not—it is a power to be exercised only where it is necessary and proper also; where propriety and necessity unite to demand it in any State. And confessedly it is a power in this Government originally given for the purpose of interposing Federal authority when States did not pass laws for the election of Representatives in Congress. Where, owing to any cause, whether to default or to hostility of a State, the people of the State could not have elections for Representatives to this body, then the interposition is to be made. Does it follow, because there may be occasion for it in California, that the whole country should be put under the condemnation of such a statute?

You were told yesterday by my colleague, who is not now present [Mr. VAUX], that the State of New York did not vote for General Washington for President at his first election. It neglected to do so. That was in 1793. Supposing the State had not passed a law for Representatives for the year 1790 or the year 1792, would not Congress have had the right to legislate under this very clause of the Constitution and pass an act to enable the citizens of New York to elect Representatives? But would they have applied such law to all the other States that had proper laws and where there was no need for it?

Take the case of Virginia, at the opening of the rebellion. Part of the State was loyal and part went into the rebellion. The Legislature might have repealed the law with reference to the election of Representatives to Congress. I take the situation without reference to the nicety of facts that did occur. The State might have repealed their law for the election of Representatives in our Congress. Would it not have been within the legitimate power of this Government to pass an act of Congress with swift haste to allow the loyal citizens of Virginia to elect Representatives here, thus preserving their rights? It could have been done under this clause of the Constitution; and it was for just such cases as this that it was intended, as stated in the minority report on this bill.

Suppose, again, that the Legislature of Virginia had not repealed the law of Congressional elections; that the law continued, for the people desired to have Representatives on this floor, but the State law required them to send the election returns to Richmond, for the government there to make return here. Could not Congress have passed a law to change that State law in that particular, and have allowed the returns to be made in each district to some officer appointed for the purpose, by whom return could be made to this House? Certainly the Constitution was wisely conceived in that provision which authorizes Congress to make or alter regulations regarding representation in Congress when the States refuse or neglect to make them. I have cited cases to illustrate this power, or rather its application. The plain men in the country, the men who read the Constitution as they would read any other public instrument intended for the information and instruction of all people—the common people as well as the experts—they would all understand that power in Congress to be as I have described it. Why, then, have you got this bill here involving many million dollars of outlay to subsidize men at elections in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Minnesota, and all of the other States where there is not even a pretense of necessity? I say, therefore, there is nothing truer than that while some gentlemen think this bill is not as general as it ought to be, it is, in fact, too general even upon the very argument made in its favor—the argument of necessity, which, however, is stoutly denied and is not proved. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GREENHALGE. Whenever, Mr. Speaker, I am in doubt as to the wisdom or expediency of any proposed legislation in this House, I have a certain rule which enables me to at once resolve any such doubt. If I find that opposition to a pending measure is coupled with a virulent attack upon Massachusetts or upon some of her distinguished thinkers or scholars, like my colleague in this House [Mr. LODGE], whose ability, integrity, and high purposes are a glory to Massachusetts, I know then that the measure thus opposed is one in the interest of progress, of order, of liberty, and of equality.

It is natural, Mr. Speaker, that these attacks upon Massachusetts should be made. As her flashing ideas march out like battalions from the citadel of her peerless intellect it is only natural, it is only to be expected that the forces of vice and corruption, the guerrillas of political society, should hang upon the flanks of her forces and attempt to impede and interrupt their onward march. This is as natural as that vice should hate virtue. When Iago, speaking of the man whose honesty he hated, said, "There is a daily beauty in his life which makes mine ugly," he only repeated the sentiment which finds voice whenever the ideas of Massachusetts come to the front. Why, it is true that all the ideas that have come from that noble Commonwealth are not perfect.

It must be remembered that from the alembic of her glowing thought thousands of new opinions and new theories are brought before the eyes of the world. Some are transmuted into gold and abide forever; some are discovered to be dross and are thrown away. But what we complain of, and what we have a right to complain of, Mr. Speaker, is that we find men and communities to-day using as their daily standard diet, relishing as the tid-bits and delicacies of their table, the garbage which was flung from her kitchen a hundred years ago! This is the fault which we have to find with some people, with some individuals, and with some communities and sections to-day.

It is enough, Mr. Speaker, to be assured that a measure is right to find coupled to the opposition this feeling in regard to the old Commonwealth.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a good deal of interest to the objections made upon the floor of this House to the pending measure.

Those objections are not without a certain interest. They are worthy of consideration. When Rip Van Winkle, awaking from his sleep of twenty years, came down the mountain side, old and gray and with flowing locks, to mingle again with busy men, his ideas were interesting, although not particularly original or instructive. [Laughter.] Now, some gentlemen upon the other side resemble Rip Van Winkle in one particular—they have slept twenty years; but, unlike Rip Van Winkle, they have not yet awaked, nor do they show signs of waking. [Laughter.] I was pleased, Mr. Speaker, to hear my venerable friend from Pennsylvania yesterday [Mr. VAUX]. I have now dropped the subject of Rip Van Winkle. [Laughter.] Comparisons are odious. [Laughter.] I welcomed him as what is called by some laudator temporis acti, a glowing and genuine eulogist of the days that are no more.

I like to hear that expression of regard for what we shall probably see no more in this country or upon earth. I like to hear my friend's interpretation of the clause of the Constitution now under consideration. There was a freshness and naïveté about his interpretation of the words to "make or alter" [laughter] in this clause. I thought perhaps the interpretation was characteristic. I am not very familiar with the subject by which he endeavored to illustrate his construction of this clause, but as he and some other gentlemen seemed to speak with considerable feeling upon the subject I may be permitted to hope there was no sad personal experience which led them to take that somewhat gloomy view. [Great laughter.]

I only know this, Mr. Speaker, that when the interpretation of the Constitution is given into the hands of a strict constructionist—and I gather that most of the gentlemen who have spoken on the other side are strict constructionists of the most straitest sect—somehow or other, by fair means or foul, by logic or lack of logic, their interpretation results in the emasculation of the Constitution. [Laughter.] Now, I say, Mr. Speaker, that the Constitution gives in clear and unmistakable terms authority to this Congress to enact the legislation proposed in this bill. I say that the exigency requiring that legislation exists in the lawlessness, in the illegal proceedings at numerous election precincts, which is matter, I believe, of common knowledge and common shame, and, I hope, of common regret. This is not so much denied as it is justified under the circumstances.

Now, when I speak of the Constitution, and in its praise and support, I shall not use "vain repetitions as the heathen do." I shall not do it mouth-honor, and then, by my conduct, prove that I believe it to be an instrument which ought to be "more honored in the breach than the observance." I say that the terms of the Constitution upon this particular matter are susceptible of only one explanation, and no other explanation of them ever was given until this afternoon by the gentleman who has just sat down [Mr. BUCKALEW]. "Make or alter" he says means only that Congress may intervene where the States have failed to make regulations. How, then, does he dispose of the word "alter?"

Certainly not in so felicitous a manner as his colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. VAUX]. If it means only to supply a defect, to do something for the State which has not been done, how can anybody, even the Congress of the United States, "alter" what does not exist and what never existed?

They tell us upon the other side that the proposed measure is revolutionary. I should say, Mr. Speaker, that when you consider the causes, the events which brought into existence this Republic, the noblest of all Commonwealths, ancient or modern, the application of the term "revolutionary" is, to say the least, unfortunate. It must have been devised by some consummate master of infelicitous expression upon that side (and I know there are many there), because it is a matter of common knowledge that the people of this country are accustomed to associate with the term "revolution" the idea of independence, of political equality, of civil liberty.

If this measure is revolutionary it is in the high sense in which the Declaration of Independence is revolutionary, in the same sense in which the Virginia Bill of Rights is revolutionary, in the same sense in which the Constitution itself is revolutionary. Why, to call this bill revolutionary is a contradiction in terms, if what is meant is that in its relation to the Constitution and the laws it is revolutionary. Its whole purpose, aim, and scope, leaving out of account any question of imperfection of detail of this or that feature, upon which honest men may differ as to its being expedient or objectionable, its whole aim and purpose is to conserve, to defend, to save the Constitution, and to give equal political rights to every one of the people of the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, when we consider this bill in these aspects, from this standpoint, I think we have a right to repel the accusations and insinuations that have been made that this is a bill in the interest of partisan aggrandizement. I say here upon my honor as a Representative, if I believed that, I would not vote for this bill nor for any section, clause, or line contained in it. I want simply fair and free elections, and if the gentleman from Pennsylvania who last took his seat [Mr. BUCKALEW] would reason for one moment, he would be slow to hurl at the Committee on Elections of this House these charges of unfairness and partisanship.

Why, sir, after the most careful scrutiny, after a delay which I should think would convince any fair-minded man that this matter does not proceed with undue heat or partisan haste, we have not seated half the contestants who have come before that committee, and the fact that members have been left in their seats because upon our conscientious view of the evidence in their cases we were unable to come to a conclusion, when, if we acted from partisan feeling, if all we required was a partisan majority, it would have been just as easy to seat A as to seat B, the whole seventeen contestants as five or six—that fact, I think, entitles me to resent these insinuations upon the honor and the conscience of this most responsible and honorable committee. Such wild and reckless charges savor more of blind partisan frenzy than any act of that committee. Mr. Speaker, I look at this question in a widely different manner from that of a partisan. I think there is a deeper and broader and more pregnant meaning than that, and I reason in this way: The theory of this Government vests all sovereignty in the people. The only way in which the people can exercise that sovereignty is by means of the ballot. The ballot is the very breath of life of the body politic.

Stifle the ballot and you strangle the body politic, you strangle the people. And if a political wrong is done in one State of this Union, that wrong causes a thrill, a vibration, a shock through every State in the whole Union. So perfect, Mr. Speaker, is this Union to-day, thank God—the Union of this vast Republic, across which "deep calleth unto deep," the Atlantic to the Pacific, the Gulf to Superior—so close, so sensitive, yet so strong is this fabric extending over this vast area, that a wrong done to the meanest citizen in the remotest corner of this Union is felt as a personal wrong to every citizen in the most distant part of our land. And it is necessary that this feeling should exist, that it should be cultivated.

Why, sir, a crime against the ballot is a crime not only against the man, the individual, it is a crime against the majesty of the State; it is a crime against the majesty of the United States throned here—here, in this noble Capitol. And if you permit a wrong to be done to the humblest citizen, white or black—a political wrong, "the danger-light upon your charter"—that wrong will come home to you in whatever section of the country you may live.

They tell us, Mr. Speaker, that involved in the question before the House is a mighty and stupendous problem; that there is in effect here a race issue; that we are attempting by this bill to establish an empire of ignorance over knowledge, of barbarism over civilization, of an inferior race over a superior. God forbid! I would be no party to any movement or measure of that sort. But I am surprised that this cry of distress comes from that strong race which has trod the earth for a thousand years a conqueror.

Now, I do not believe that under any law, in any system of society, the brute force of Caliban can ever overcome the magic power of Prospero's intellect. Only in one case, Mr. Speaker, can that result ever follow; that case is when the master intellect stoops to use the base and brutish methods of the slavish monster at his feet. It is only then that any community is in danger from what are called its lowest and its worst classes. The kingly power of one man's intellect will sway by the arts of justice and truth scores and hundreds and thousands of inferior beings; and the same rule is truer where one race has been accustomed to hold a subordinate position and the other race has always held the position of the superior.

I am surprised to hear some of the objections made to the constitutionality of this measure. Why, sir, this question is discussed in a well reasoned article in the Federalist, No. 59, referring to this very clause, that—

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

After stating the objections which were made—not at the time when the provision was adopted, but after it was adopted—it is said:

In answer to all such reasoning it was urged that there was not a single article in the whole system more completely defensible. Its propriety rested upon this plain proposition, that every Government ought to contain in itself the means of its own preservation.

A discretionary power over elections must be vested somewhere. There seemed but three ways in which it could be reasonably organized: It might be lodged either wholly in the National Legislature, or wholly in the State Legislatures; or primarily in the latter, and ultimately in the former. The last was the mode adopted by the convention. The regulation of elections is submitted in the first instance, to the local governments, which, in ordinary cases, and when no improper views prevail—may both conveniently and satisfactorily be by them exercised. But in extraordinary circumstances, the power is reserved to the National Government, so that it may not be abused, and thus hazard the safety and permanence of the Union.

And the question is, whether the views prevailing now in some sections are proper or improper—

Nothing can be more evident than that an exclusive power in the State Legislatures to regulate elections for the National Government would leave the existence of the Union entirely at their mercy.

These sentiments are quoted and approved in the great work of Mr. Justice Story upon the Constitution of the United States, chapter 11, section 814. And Mr. Rawle, a constitutional lawyer from the State of Pennsylvania, in his learned work upon the Constitution, takes precisely the same view and approves the principles here laid down. I say, then, Mr. Speaker, that we have clearly, unmistakably the right to enact this legislation.

I have noticed with some care the various objections made to the particular plan suggested in this bill. No bill is entirely perfect. There are some provisions here which even now, from my standpoint, might be amended and ameliorated. But the chief objections which seem to come to these features of the bill from the other side relate to extravagance or economy, and to expediency.

The proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. EWART] would seem to be that if he is well off in his district as I am well off in my district or another gentleman in his, our view should extend not one rod beyond the limits of our districts; that if our neighbor's house is in flames or if robbers and murderers are assaulting him we should shut our doors and go quietly to bed, to "sleep the sleep of the just."

Now, I admire the chivalrous, noble, public-spirited position of the gentleman from Maryland, and I believe it is more impregnated and more inspired by the fire of a true American citizenship than that of the gentleman from North Carolina. We do not live unto ourselves alone. We want justice and peace to prevail from one end of the Union to the other.

Mr. Speaker, my time is short and I am not permitted to go into the various special features of this bill as I should be pleased to do. But I say to my friends on the other side of the House I am not inclined to take any view savoring of levity; I am not inclined to speak lightly or unfeelingly of the troubled situation of affairs—of the disturbed condition of political society in their section of the Republic. No; I say that grave and appalling problem is one that will tax all the genius and all the strength and courage of this invincible people to solve.

But I take this ground, that Lincoln, giving gifts to men (and he gave many), gave liberty to the Afro-American. When the shackles are once broken, when they are once removed from the body of a man—and all history and law concur to establish this principle—when they have once been stricken off, no power on earth, no power in hell, can put those shackles upon that man again! The Afro-American is enfranchised. He has been clothed with citizenship. You can not extirpate, you can not destroy, you can not exile him. All that is left for us to do, then, is to humanize, to civilize, to educate, to elevate him. That is the only path of safety. The freedman has now become a citizen, a unit of sovereignty, an integral part of the great people of this Republic.

The old maxim tells us to do justice though the heavens fall. The heavens never fall when justice is done. It is when injustice is done that the heavens fall—in thunderbolts, in fire, in ashes, in "plague, pestilence, and famine, in battle, murder, and sudden death." The duty of our people towards the Republic in every State, in every Congressional district, is clear. There is only one path which can be traveled with safety. Let justice and equity prevail, let the laws be obeyed, give to every citizen his full political rights, and I believe that this line of political demarcation between the races will be obliterated; I believe that every great obstacle keeping one race from living in amity with the other will be removed.

I remember in the evidence in the Alabama case of Threet vs. Clarke one striking and vital statement was made in the simple, grand language of one of the colored witnesses. Speaking of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLARKE], he said: "When he held the office of county attorney he did not know black from white. He treated all men alike." He did justice; and if you judge the cause of the poor and needy, then it will be well with you. Then there will be amity, not necessarily social equality—that is a matter of individual liberty and choice—but you will have, I think, taken the right course to cut the Gordian knot now entangling the vitals of the Republic. [Applause.] You will have done something towards making this country a land—

Where the common sense of most shall hold a fretful realm in awe,
And the kindly earth shall slumber lapt in universal law.

[Prolonged applause on the Republican side.]

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following conference report on the legislative bill. I ask for the reading of the statement, which fully explains the report.

The statement was read, as follows:

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9065) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year 1891 submit the following written statement in explanation of the action recommended on each of said amendments agreed upon by the conference committee:

On amendments 3 and 4: Provides for a telegraph page, at $720, for the Senate. On amendments 5, 6, 7, and 8: Appropriates $700, or so much thereof as may be necessary, as proposed by the House, for hire of horse and wagon for the Secretary of the Senate, instead of $600 as proposed by the Senate, and provides for an additional clerk at $2,220 in the office of the Secretary of the Senate.

On amendments 11 and 12: Provides for an assistant clerk at $1,440 for the Senate Committee on Claims.

On amendments 13, 14, 15, and 16: Provides for six additional messengers at $1,440 each, three additional skilled laborers at $1,000 each, and three additional laborers at $720 each, under the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate.

On amendments 17 and 18: Provides for two additional mail carriers at $1,200 each in the Senate post-office.

On amendments 19 and 20: Provides for six additional folders during the session at $3 per day in the Senate folding room.

On amendments 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, and 31: Increases items for contingent expenses of the Senate as proposed by their amendments, as follows: For stationery, from $14,500 to $15,500; for postage for the Secretary's office, from $150 to $200; for fuel for heating apparatus, from $6,000 to $8,500; and appropriates $15,000, as proposed by the House, instead of $25,000, for expenses of inquiries and investigations ordered by the Senate.

On the amendments numbered 2, 21, 22, 23, 24, and 25, proposing to increase the compensation of the session committee clerks and clerks to Senators from $6 per day during the session to $1,800 per annum, the committee have been unable to agree.

BENJ. BUTTERWORTH,
J. G. CANNON,
WM. H. FORNEY,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. In regard to the various amendments made by the Senate to the legislative bill, and upon which we disagreed, the House decided to recede from the amendments recited in this report down to that which relates to the clerks of Senators. Without going into them in detail I will state that the items in conference related to the clerks to the committees, to the increase of mail clerks, increase of messengers, and matters of that kind. We have, of course, to rely upon the statements of the Senators themselves as to what they need to conduct the business of the Senate.

They have quite a large number of additional committee-rooms, not in the Capitol building, but some distance removed from the Senate Chamber, and they were required to have additional skilled laborers and messengers. They found it also necessary to have a page at the telegraph, the force they have being inadequate for performing the increased service. And so on, Mr. Speaker, in regard to the other matters in which the Senate makes the increase. The amount of this increase was stated on yesterday.

Mr. DOCKERY. Is there any reduction?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. There is no reduction anywhere in the number of the employes of the Senate. This is an increase of skilled laborers, messengers, mail carriers, and a page, as well as an assistant clerk in the office of the Secretary of the Senate.

The evidence was conclusive to our minds that these were necessary; the Senators themselves so asserted, and, after having given careful consideration to the matter, there is nothing left for us, we find, but to rely upon their statement in that regard.

Mr. FORNEY. I will state that the Senate are paying them under a resolution of the Senate. All those officers are now being carried on the rolls of the Senate under a resolution.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I thank my friend for the suggestion. They are now borne upon the rolls of the Senate and paid out of the contingent fund, and of course it would be better that they should be paid otherwise. Hence your committee recommends that the House recede in that behalf. We then reached the question of an increase in the salary of the clerks supplied to the several Senators. It is proper to say that nearly every Republican in the Senate is chairman of some committee, and that by reason of having a chairmanship he has a clerk. Nearly all of them have clerks the year round. The minority—

Mr. CANNON. If you will allow me just one word there. There are now about twenty-six committees in the Senate that have clerks, and they are session clerks; but in this bill they are made annual at $1,800 a year.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I understand that; but I repeat again that a very large number of the Republican members have clerks in this way. I state it because it is proper that we should know exactly upon what ground the amendment rests. The members of the political minority of the Senate do not have annual clerks. The question arose as to whether a clerk was necessary during the entire year, whether or not the duties that devolved upon a Senator or upon a member of the House require that they should have a clerk, not only during the session, but during vacation. They decided for themselves that it was necessary that each member of the Senate should have a secretary.

And, secondly, that it involved but a small increase, that is, if we adopt the amount which I am satisfied they are willing to agree to, but a small increase over the amount that is now expended for that clerical help, and that, in point of fact, there is no economy in making them merely session clerks. Now, that is the conclusion they reached. We did not reach the same conclusion. We were satisfied that the House would not be willing to provide for an annual clerk to each member of the Senate, especially at the rate the bill fixed—$1,800 a year. So far as the amount is concerned, however, I am satisfied that the Senate would come to an agreement in that behalf to make the amount $1,500, or some amount which might seem adequate and just.

Mr. DOCKERY. Do I understand my friend from Ohio to say that the conferees have agreed upon every item except the clerks to Senators?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Yes, we have agreed upon every item except clerks to Senators. The Senate has incorporated in the bill a provision giving an annual clerk, if I may use the expression, to each Senator. A large number of them have clerks, being the clerks of committees, who serve them throughout the year in the dispatch of their business.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. MILLIKEN. In all the discussions of this matter has any provision been made for a clerk to each member of the House?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. No, sir; I was just about to remark—

Mr. MILLIKEN. One single word further. Can my friend from Ohio give me any reason—because I know he is as able to do it as almost anybody else—why a Senator should have a clerk and a member of the House should not have one?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. There is no reason on earth.

Mr. MCKINLEY. Except a lack of courage on the part of members to vote for it.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. But my friend knows that while we do not differ as to whether or not we should each have a clerk we do some of us differ about the disposition to walk up and employ one or vote for an appropriation to give each member a clerk.

Mr. MCKINLEY. It is simply a want of courage on the part of members of the House.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Why do not we take care of ourselves at the same time we are taking care of our Senators, and will the gentleman from Ohio tell me why we do not walk up and vote for a clerk for each member?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. My honored colleague on the right [Mr. MCKINLEY] suggests that the reason is that we lack the courage to do it, in the presence of the conviction that we ought to do it.

Mr. MILLIKEN. The gentleman may plead guilty to that for himself, but not for me. I have voted for a clerk at every session since I have been in Congress.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. As far as that is concerned the Senate insists that they ought to be permitted to judge whether the public business devolved upon each Senator is such as to require that he should have the assistance of a clerk. They know how much that business is and whether a clerk is needed or not, and they think and assert that the House ought to decide for itself whether each member of the House requires a clerk, but that it does not follow, because we are unwilling to provide ourselves with clerks, that we ought to refuse to act upon the judgment of the Senate when they assert that they need these clerks.

Mr. OATES. Will my friend from Ohio bring in an amendment here which will give members an opportunity, for he will remember that this House has never had an opportunity, to vote upon this question?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I am quite willing that they shall have an opportunity; but gentlemen will remember that I am presenting the reasons given by the conference committee, so as to inform the House in order that it may be advised. I will say to my honored friend from Alabama, as I have always said, that there is not a constituency in the United States that has a member upon this floor who is worth his board that would not be benefited by providing that member of this House with a clerk, and for this reason: We all know that every man here is overwhelmed with business—business of a quasi-public character—quasi alone. I know that there are members upon this floor who pay more than one-fourth of their salaries—I have done it myself—for clerical help to dispatch the business devolved upon me by my constituency and those who are not my immediate constituents but yet have the right to ask my opinion about a public matter and advise me concerning matters of public concern. We receive a great volume of correspondence about public matters, about matters or business pending in the Departments, about a pension, about a land grant, about agricultural lands, about arid lands, about rivers, about the Signal Service, and about a thousand things concerning which our constituents have a perfect right to inquire.

Not only that, but men who feel concerned about the transaction of public business will write you a long screed upon the silver bill, and you have to read it and reply. They will write you a long letter about the tariff, and you have to read that and reply, for they have a right to be heard, as we are their servants. They will write you about the Indian service; about the Cumberland River; about the Sue St. Mary Canal, and ask you concerning the work of the Engineer Corps; and all kinds of matters. We are bound to answer, and answer intelligently, and you can not do that without careful study and inquiry. I believe I state truly when I assert that members work at least thirteen hours a day in the public service, including this character of work.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Put it at sixteen hours.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I will put it at thirteen and be modest about it and not overstate it.

Now, gentlemen say to me, "But you are employed to do all that for a salary fixed." It is not so. We are sent here to discharge certain public business, but we none the less can not escape discharging this other branch of duty to which I have called attention, because we have no right to refuse. What the people demand is, that whatever duty is committed to our care we should do and do it well, and they will supply us with the machinery to do that work well. If it requires a clerk, well and good. I have voted for a clerk to members ever since I have been a member of this House, and I have never been criticised, denounced, or rebuked.

Now, personally I do not expect to be with the brethren very long, but I realize one thing—that the duties of a Congressman are onerous; I realize that they have more to do than ought to be required of any two men, and I believe in helping them in every way by providing them with such assistance as will enable them fairly, fully, and properly to discharge the duties that devolve upon them.

Hence, I would suggest to my friend that I am not only willing, but would be glad to do it; but I desire to reflect the judgment of this House in this matter. Speaking for myself personally, I would vote without the least hesitation to embody in the conference report a provision giving to every Senator a secretary, if they think they need one; but if gentlemen here say, "We shall not have one," while we agree that we ought to have one, shall we say, because we have not and because we will not take that which we are entitled to and ought to have, shall we say to them, "You shall not have it?"

The question as to the rate is another thing. I think that the salary is fixed too high by the Senate amendment. It ought to be reduced. I think the conferees on the other side think it ought to be reduced. So far as the clerks to members are concerned, I know that to give each member a clerk would benefit and facilitate the transaction of public business. To have a clerk who could in a short time become familiar with the routine work of a member outside of the House would enhance the quality of labor done inside of the House.

Mr. OATES. Let me inquire if there is a way in this conference report in which these clerks may be granted.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. You may offer an amendment instructing the conferees to make such an arrangement. I say I am willing to do it; but how my colleagues will act in such a case I can not say. I am perfectly willing to offer such an amendment as my friend suggests. I believe it is just to my fellow-members, but I could not say what the other members of the committee would do.

Mr. OATES. I introduced a bill of that kind in three Congresses, and have made a favorable report on it.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That is a point upon which we might separate. If it is sanctioned in this House, so far as I might be concerned, I would be willing to introduce in committee such an amendment reducing the salary.

I do not know my colleague's views, but these are mine. I have always thought that the public service would be profited by such an enactment, and for that reason I will offer it and I will vote for it, but the result will of course depend largely upon the views of gentlemen when we get into the House.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. I understood the gentleman to suggest that he, in conference, would move an amendment to this bill to provide clerks for members. Now, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I will do so if it is thought desirable. Let me say to my friend, before he proceeds, that I only desire to do it if in my judgment the sense of this House would sustain that course. My own judgment is in favor of it.

Mr. CANNON. Before the gentleman proceeds further, let me remind the House that under an order heretofore made we take a recess at half past 5, and I suggest that the gentleman from Ohio ask that the session be continued until we dispose of this report.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Well this is Saturday afternoon—

Mr. CANNON. But the report ought to be disposed of.

Mr. DOCKERY. I think everybody understands this question. Now, let us have a vote.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I ask unanimous consent that the order which provides for taking a recess at half past 5 o'clock be so far modified as to authorize us to continue in session until this conference report is disposed of.

Mr. KILGORE. With the understanding that no other business is to be transacted.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. BREWER. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that he ask to have the conference report concurred in so far as it has been agreed upon.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I will make that request, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Before the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] proceeds with this matter which he has interjected here, no doubt under a sense of duty—I make no complaint about it at all, but it unfortunately has abated the time which has been allotted for the discussion of the pending order—before he proceeds I wish to make what I think is a very reasonable request in so important a matter which concerns so many people. I ask unanimous consent that the general debate upon the pending order, the election bill, be extended from 2 o'clock until 3 o'clock on Monday, so as to allow some of us a little more time for general debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. MCRAE. And I desire to prefer an additional request for unanimous consent that we meet at 10 o'clock on Monday.

Mr. CANNON. I have no objection to meeting at 10 o'clock, but at this time I do not want to consent to extend the order beyond 2 o'clock. That may be done later, but for the present I can not consent.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Do I understand the gentleman from Illinois to object?

Mr. CANNON. For the present I object, but I have no objection to commencing the session at 10 o'clock.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] knows that it is impracticable to get gentlemen here on Monday morning at 10 o'clock. My proposition does not extend the time to be occupied by the debate and does not delay the vote a particle. I submit to the gentleman that in common fairness, in view of the time occupied by this report and other matters, the request ought to be acceded to.

Mr. CANNON. That can be arranged on Monday morning as well as now.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. But gentlemen who desire to speak upon the question would like to know about it in advance.

Mr. CANNON. Well, possibly it can be arranged to-night, at the evening session. For the present I must object.

Mr. STRUBLE. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether or not the Senators desire to have their committee clerks made annual.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Yes, sir; that is, the clerks that would be provided for would be annual instead of session clerks, and, as I said to the House a moment ago, looking the matter all over, the difference in pay is not very great, because they would probably agree to a rate of compensation that would make the difference inconsiderable; and they say further, that during the recess the business of these clerks is about as onerous as during the session.

Mr. STRUBLE. I hope that if the session clerks of the Senate committees are to be made annual, the same consideration will be given to the House committee clerks, so that all may be treated alike.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That is the view expressed by several gentlemen about me, and, so far as the Senate are concerned, they seem to desire to come to an accommodation about the matter. I move that the House now adopt the conference report so far as agreed to in conference.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to trespass upon the time of this House by making any remarks. I simply want to say that I shall content myself with voting against this report. I have seen statements in the newspapers as to what might be the action of another body, and without undertaking to criticize any one, I think that perhaps by insisting a little more strongly we might have secured a reduction of public expenditures in this bill.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I renew the request I made a few minutes ago, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] having withdrawn his objection.

Mr. CANNON. I misunderstood the request when I objected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate be extended from 2 o'clock p. m. until 3 o'clock on Monday next.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa, rose.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. If my friend will permit me, I would like to dispose of the first part of the report.

The report of the committee of conference, so far as agreed upon by the conferees, was adopted.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me it is not proper, and I do not think it is according to the rules, for a committee of conference to bring in a report upon an independent proposition submitted in conference for the first time and to ask this House to vote upon it—a proposition providing for a large increased expenditure of public money, which has never been considered in this House in the Committee of the Whole. I think amendments to this bill have already been consented to by the conferees which ought not to have been consented to, at least not without a fuller submission of the question to this House. I know it to be a fact that there has been an increase of the salaries of twenty-five clerks in the Patent Office, a matter very strongly disapproved by a vote of this House when it was under consideration here; and I remarked at the time that I thought the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] was influenced in the speech he made on that subject by his own association with the clerks in that Department.

I will say to the gentleman that I know the people in the community where I reside do not approve of this large increase in the expenditure of public money for officials. I believe there is a very strong sentiment among the people that their representatives in public life are very much more influenced by the recommendations of officials holding clerkships, and who are pressing applications for increase of salary, than they are by the body of the people who pay the taxes.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Let me say to my friend that these items of increase relate entirely to new appointments by the Senate itself.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. But I alluded to the matter that passed through yesterday without any investigation, as I understand, by the House.

Mr. FORNEY. To what does the gentleman refer as having passed through here without investigation?

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. I allude to the fact that there was an increase of $100 each in the salaries of twenty-five clerks in the Patent Office—

Mr. FORNEY. Thirty.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. To which my attention, at least, was not called.

Mr. FORNEY. That question was before the House three or four times.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. It was not considered yesterday.

Mr. FORNEY. It was the other day.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. It was only acted on yesterday.

Now, in regard to this matter of clerks for members of Congress, I believe that in a large number of cases where Representatives are pressed for time it is because they are transacting private business outside of the duties they are required to perform as members of this House, but if they believe that the interests of their constituents require that they should have the assistance of clerks they can employ them and pay them out of their salary of $5,500 a year received as regular compensation, mileage, etc.—a salary which is $2,500 more than Webster and Clay and Calhoun received when they were transacting the business of this country and rendering their names immortal by the manner in which they performed their duties.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I trust my friend will not fail to remember that Mr. Clay could buy potatoes here at 3 cents a bushel, eggs at 2 cents a dozen, molasses at 20 cents a gallon, pork at $2.50 a hundred, and so on. [Laughter.] And he got board at a first-class hotel for $4 a week.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. I do not yield to the gentleman farther. We have heard that scree repeated here five or six times in this Congress. The gentleman, as we are informed, is going to retire to private life; he is not to pass the scrutiny of the American people in the elections this fall. [Laughter.] He can talk bravely now; but it is the first time that he has talked on these public questions in this Hall with this amount of temerity.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I submit to the House that the gentleman is grievously mistaken. I think I have been courageous on public questions where he, possibly, was timid.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. I know the gentleman is in the habit of sneering at gentlemen who make these objections as men of small caliber.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. When and where have I done so?

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. I tell the gentleman that he makes a mistake in belittling the position of any man in private life who opposes this increase of the salaries of members of Congress.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I have not referred to the gentleman or anybody else in such terms as he indicates.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. I know that there have been Representatives of the Republican party who have been retired to the shades of private life on account of their efforts in this direction, and I say to the gentleman that if this course is persisted in—if the expenses of the administration of this Government are enlarged from year to year on account of the increase of the salaries of public officials—the time will come when there will be a party in this country that will be organized on the basis of demanding economy in the expenditures of the public money.

Mr. DOCKERY. You have such a party now on this side of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. In answer to the gentleman I say that there are great leaders on that side of the House who come forward when this question is presented and stand shoulder to shoulder by the gentlemen here who are asking that they may be allowed clerks. And yet these very men will go to the people and denounce the extravagance of a Republican Administration when they, by their influence and by their example and by their action, have done the very best they could to contribute to that extravagance.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Before the gentleman takes his seat will he allow a question?

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I understand the gentleman to say that if the Republicans continue to vote for an increase of salaries and for other extravagant appropriations, as he alleges, the public would retire them to obscurity. Now, if that is the case, I wish to ask the gentleman if he could not induce more of them to vote in that direction.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. I said that if the policy of increasing salaries gradually, sometimes by efforts from that side of the House, and sometimes by efforts on this side of the House—and I think that most of the extravagant measures that have been put forward in this Congress have been advocated by men over on that side of the House—[Cries of "Oh, no!" on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. I say that if the policy is persisted in it will most likely result in taking a good many men who advocate it out of public life.

Now another word, and I will close. A gentleman on the other side of the House on yesterday made the statement that he had not before heard me take this position. I refer to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOW]. I desire to tell that gentleman that he did me great injustice. I have for the two years I have been a member of this House occupied exactly the same position, and I do not expect ever again to be a member of it, but I do expect to pay taxes to this Government as a citizen during the period of my natural life, and I will demand from my agents here in Congress, representing the poor as well as the wealthy, absolute economy in the administration of public affairs.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I only desire to reply for a very few moments to the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa, in which I think, as everybody present is probably aware, he does me a gross injustice when he said I was in the habit of sneering at anybody or anybody's opinion.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. Did not you speak of small-bore people?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. No such expression escaped my lips. If there is anything that I try to do in my public and private life it is to treat everybody with absolute respect. I never intentionally wound the feelings of any one. I respect the individual, although I may have very little respect for the opinion. [Laughter.]

I have encountered, as the gentleman has, upon the stump and elsewhere, a class of men who criticize your action without rhyme, reason, or intelligence. I referred to that class when I spoke a few moments ago. I said I had been assailed by such persons in my district. I did not refer to my friend from Iowa at all. In that connection I applied a descriptive appellation that characterized the quality of the men who did it, for I knew them. And I said in that connection, and I repeat now, that such attacks fall still-born. But I do not sneer at anybody. I know that the honorable gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KERR] has devoted himself to securing economy in governmental expenditures. But there is a question as to what constitutes economy. There may be increased expenditures that are economical, for there is such a thing as "saving at the spigot and losing at the bung-hole."

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. You repeated that before. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Yes; I repeated it before, and I repeat it now. The question is whether our duties are of such magnitude and character that the public interests would be subserved by procuring such help for us as a secretary could render, and whether we shall pay for that public service out of our own pockets or the pockets of the people, whose agents we are and whose business we are transacting.

So far as my retiring from public life is concerned, I noticed that my honorable friend from Iowa, before he took his seat, said that he should probably never come back here again. Now, if I was as uncharitable as I think the gentleman is, I might possibly suggest that he wanted to be returned, ergo, he poses as an economist [laughter and applause]—but I will not say so.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa, rose.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. So the gentleman need not rise. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. I will say to the gentleman that I did not want to be returned.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I do not yield now; I will directly. I want to say that nobody has a higher respect for the gentleman from Iowa than I have; nobody has, in my judgment, exhibited more evidence than he of a desire to serve the public faithfully, and he knows my opinion. But I do not think that it is commendable in any man to rise up and walk rough-shod over our convictions and feelings, leaving the imprint of his hob-nails. [Laughter.]

Doest thou think, because thou art virtuous, there shall be no more cakes and ale?

[Laughter and applause.]

Now, my own judgment is and has been, and I have expressed it frequently, and gentlemen about me will bear witness that I have not hesitated to express it freely, that the public interests would be subserved by permitting each member of the House to have a clerk. It is not a new thing with me, as my colleagues around me know. I have been at all times willing to encounter whatever risk might be necessarily encountered from public sentiment in doing what I believed to be right in that direction. I am willing, and have been willing, to incur any censure that an act so obviously just might invoke.

So far as private business is concerned, there is no man here but knows that if his connection with bread and butter depended alone upon the salary received for his service here, and he was cut loose from every possible mooring of private business and had no other resource than his salary, in a few years he would be in a financial condition that would suggest the almshouse.

I am conscientious in the discharge of my public duty as I understand it; and I think I have given all the hours that God has given me strength to endure in the discharge of my public duty, whether that labor has been wisely bestowed or not. And I only wish to say that I regret that I have been unable to do for members what I would like; I meet members of this House every day upon the street and at the Departments who I know ought to have the assistance of a secretary. I find gentlemen about me proceeding from prayer to profanity each day because they are loaded down with business that they can not dispatch for the want of adequate help, and they are too poor to pay out more money for the purpose of securing it.

It is not a man who can simply write that will answer the purpose. It is not a man who is good in spelling that will answer the purpose, but a man must be not only intelligent but quick, and one who can catch on instantly to the duties that your require of him, and hence he is not a cheap man. I say my country is safer when she provides adequate means for transacting her business and for enabling her public servants to discharge their duties, without being haunted by the fear of going to the poor-house in the evening of life as one of the rewards of faithful public service. [Applause.] I know a great many upon this floor who began life as tangle-haired, bare-footed, ragged boys, who have, by faithful service in private and in public life, fought their way up to honorable station in the State and nation, and whatever they have accomplished, whatever they have won of public esteem, has been the result of persistent and honest effort. They are here about me, and the fact that they have been trusted by their constituents, by the millions of people of this country, suggests that they can be trusted when they say, "To discharge these duties we need this additional help."

If they will not trust you in these little things, by what consideration ought they to trust you in greater? [Applause.] If they will not trust you in the matter of hiring a clerk at $600 or $1,000 a year, how can they safely trust you to vote on bills that involve millions of dollars? I feel that our constituents can trust us in that matter. I believe that we are entitled to this help. I know we need it. If any one feels that he does not, he can cover the allowance back into the Treasury and so build a monument to himself before the people if he wants to. [Laughter.] Knowing that we need this help, and believing that the interests of our constituents will be served thereby, I would be remiss in the discharge of my duty if I hesitated to vote for it. And in so believing and so asserting I do not disparage the wisdom of others, nor do I call their judgment in question because it differs from mine.

I am simply giving my view about it, and if it pleases the House I would be glad to provide clerks to members for the next session or for the next Congress if you please. That would not come to any of us unless we are re-elected. I would be glad to provide for that assistance which I feel we so greatly need and ought to have, and which my constituents, so far as I have talked with them, agree we should have. Those molders of public opinion, the knights of the quill, who look down upon us from the Press Gallery, agree that we ought to have it. And where a man knows he is entitled to a thing and ought to have it and does not take it, there is a suspicion that he might take that which he is not entitled to, where it did not create any suspicion that he was acting wrongly or betraying a public trust. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say one word. I have from time to time myself, when the matter has been presented before the House, voted for some adjustment of this matter covering clerks' hire and clerical assistance for members of the House, but I beg to call the attention of the House for a moment to this bill. The only items in conference now are to be found on page 8, amendments 21, 22, 23, 24, and 25, under the head of "the Senate." The appropriations under the head of "the House of Representatives" are all closed, and these two items of difference between the House and Senate are as follows:

For twenty-six clerks to committees, at $1,800 each, $46,800.

The House provision is as it has been heretofore, for twenty-five clerks to committees at $6 a day during the session. Now the Senate amends that and says "We will add one more to those committees that now have only session clerks. We will make the number twenty-six, and we will give them each an annual clerk at $1,800." Then the next amendment:

For clerks to Senators who are not chairmen of committees, at $1,800 each.

The appropriation now is "for clerks to Senators who are not chairmen of committees, during the session," so much money. The House recommended $21,700. The Senate strikes that out and puts in $63,000 for clerks to Senators, and strikes out $18,150 and puts in $46,800 to make these clerks to committees annual.

As the law now is, it would cost about $57,000, and this increase nearly doubles it. Now, we might just as well look at the matter practically. My opinion is that, if anybody made a point of order to a motion to instruct the conferees to put on a provision for House clerks, it could not be done, because that matter is not in conference. There is no disagreement between the two Houses on that. The only thing between the two Houses now is not with reference to House clerks, but it is in regard to clerks for Senators and an increase of clerks to Senate committees.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That had not occurred to me. Is that a fact, that we could not amend at this stage?

Mr. CANNON. In my opinion that is the fact, that we could not amend in that way.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Could not instruct the committee?

Mr. CANNON. In my opinion the suggestion which I have made is correct, and that a point of order could be made either as against instruction or amendment, because the only difference between the House and the Senate is whether the House shall recede or the Senate shall recede touching these amendments. The House provisions are entirely closed.

Mr. DOCKERY. Does the gentleman from Illinois think it would be in order to concur in a Senate amendment which might be introduced on the subject?

Mr. CANNON. I do not, because the amendment must be germane. This is an amendment touching clerks to Senators, and touching an increase of salaries of certain Senate committee clerks. So much for that. I want to say that this co-ordinate branch of Congress is as important as the other. I believe the expenses and the services of each Representative are equal before the law and equal in importance to the country to those of a Senator.

So I would, if I had my way, put no distinction in salary or otherwise, so far as compensation is concerned, that is paid for from the public Treasury. I have always so believed; yet the Senate has insisted year after year that that branch should determine what its expenditures should be, and year after year it has been granted. But I want to say there is a limit to that concession. If the expenditures for the House or the Senate, payable from the public Treasury, requiring the co-operation of the House, the Senate, and the President to get the money and pay it, are extravagant and uncalled for, then either of the three co-ordinate branches can call a halt.

Now, I want to say, speaking courteously—

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will my friend allow me just a moment?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Do you not think the House is just as criminal in the way of extravagance in voting for clerks for Senators as it would be in voting for clerks for itself; and is it not a cowardly thing for us to refuse to vote ourselves clerks when we know that we need them just as much as Senators do, and at the same time vote them for the Senators, thinking the people do not see we are doing it when we are doing it for the Senate as they would see that we were doing it for ourselves?

Mr. CANNON. So far as that is concerned, I do not know of any criminality in the matter at all.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Well, I will not call it criminality. You may use a milder term.

Mr. CANNON. But I will say that it is just as objectionable, if it be objectionable at all, to vote the public money to pay a clerk to a Senator as to pay a clerk to a Representative. I have always favored, and will favor when properly presented, proper legislation that will give salaries to clerks for one as well as to the other.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. CANNON. Just let me finish.

Mr. BLAND. Just a word.

Mr. CANNON. Well.

Mr. BLAND. Why is it not germane when the Senate has put an amendment in to give themselves clerks to provide them also for members of the House? Why is it not germane to that bill to concur in their amendment with an amendment giving clerks to members of the House? It seems to me that certainly would be in order.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will take the legislative bill he will find on examination that we have here a matter that comes under the head of "Legislative—the Senate." Then we proceed to specify the items that shall be appropriated for the employés of the Senate.

Now, then, I will turn over to another page, and we will find that we proceed to make appropriations for the House of Representatives. Now, this appropriation for the House of Representatives has been in every respect closed up, and this matter of clerks to House members has never been considered in this House, and there have been two conferences. It is brought down to a disagreement between the two Houses as to these two items only, and not for the support of the House.

Mr. CUTCHEON. If the gentleman will yield to me, I would like to call his attention to a matter in the rules.

Mr. CANNON. I can not yield for a speech.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I only want to read from the rules. On page 346 of the last edition it will be found:

It is not competent for a conference committee to consider matters or subjects not in dispute between the two Houses; nor can the committee change the text of a bill to which both Houses have agreed.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The matter must be in dispute.

Mr. CANNON. It must be in dispute.

Now, I want to say my belief is that the House should not go further at this session of Congress than it has already gone when it recommended the appropriations and passed a bill providing for twenty-six session clerks for committees at $6 a day, and on the Senate side they should only have clerks to Senators where not chairmen of committees at $6 a day during the session.

I would not be willing to go that far if the precedents had not been made, but until there is legislation that shall settle this whole question, that shall fix the proper salaries for Senators' clerks and House clerks, I for one am not willing to go one single step further in granting additional clerks or additional salaries to the Senate side.

Mr. McMILLIN. Right there, will my friend allow me to ask him whether there has been any increase in the duties of those clerks of committees whose salaries are proposed to be increased by this bill over what they have heretofore performed for $6 a day?

Mr. CANNON. As I am informed, I will state in reply, not the aligheest; but, on the contrary, these twenty-six committees that now have session clerks substantially correspond to similar committees upon the House side, the minor committees. Gentlemen understand what I refer to, and I need not speak further of it. This proposition is to increase these session clerks to $1,800, there practically, as I believe, being no considerable necessity for the committees, except that they furnish Senators with committees for their convenience with a clerk thrown in, and this is to put that clerk's salary up to $1,800 and at the same time pay the individual clerks to the thirty Senators who have no committee an annual salary of $1,800 each.

Now, I think that either at this session of Congress or at the next we ought to call a halt until this matter can be adjusted. It is not for me to criticize a co-ordinate branch of the Government, and I do not; but it is proper for me to call attention to a few facts that appear upon the face of this bill. The Senate proposes to provide for two hundred and ninety-one officers and employés of that body (exclusive of reporting the debates) at salaries aggregating $422,296.10; which shows an average of more than three employés to each Senator, at an average salary of $1,451.

The bill as it stands provides for three hundred and twenty officers and employés of the House (exclusive of reporting the debates), at salaries aggregating $367,113.30; which shows an average of less than one employé to each member, with an average salary of $1,116. Three employés to each Senator, one to each member of the House. An average salary of $1,116 for House employés, an average salary of $1,451 for Senate employés. Less than one employé to each member of the House, and $35,182.80 less aggregate expenditure for officers and employés in the House than in the Senate; yet we number three hundred and thirty-five while the Senate numbers, I believe, eighty-four.

I do not criticize the Senate; I call attention to the facts. [Laughter.] I have the kindest feeling and the greatest respect for the co-ordinate branch of Congress, but it is proper that I should call attention to these facts for the purpose of saying that I am not willing to vote money further from the public Treasury until there is a proper, economical adjustment of the employés of the House and of the Senate, so that when the public money comes from the Treasury it shall come in proper quantities, not stingily or meanly, but economically, and sufficient to furnish a proper force to enable both House and Senate to carry on the business of the people.

Before I take my seat I want to say further that if I am correct in my position, either now or the next time—I do not care when, I am ready at any time—it seems to me that this House owes it to itself to march up and insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendments and there let the matter drop.

Mr. DOCKERY. Why not do it now?

Mr. CANNON. I do not know whether now is the proper time or not. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] is in charge of the bill and I will follow his judgment as to when the proper time arrives for a final motion. Gentlemen can do as they choose, either insist further and ask for a conference or take any other course they prefer. I only say that whenever the proper time comes I am ready, in the absence of any adjustment, to take the position I have indicated.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I understand that if we fail to ask for a further conference it is then within the province of the Senate to ask for such conference.

Mr. CANNON. I suppose it would be then within the province of the Senate to ask for a committee of conference. Ordinarily, however, when there is a failure to ask for a further conference it is regarded as a polite notice served on the co-ordinate branch that it can recede or that the bill can fail.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. In my judgment this matter might be arranged by the Senate receding, or by some other accommodation. At all events, I will take the sense of the House by moving that the House further insist and ask for another conference.

Mr. DOCKERY. Let that be the last.

The motion of Mr. BUTTERWORTH was agreed to.

NORDAMERIKANISCHE TURNERBUND.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present resolutions of the Nordamerikanische Turnerbund in relation to immigration and naturalization, having been requested to do so by that body; and I ask unanimous consent that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Immigration.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The resolutions are as follows:

NEW YORK, June 25, 1890.

GENTLEMEN: The "Nordamerikanische Turnerbund" (a body of loyal American citizens representing 40,000 voters) unanimously passed the following resolutions at its fourteenth biennial convention, held in the city of New York in the month of June, 1890:

"Whereas there are bills pending before the Congress of the United States and your honorable committee regarding immigration and naturalization for the purpose of restricting immigration and making naturalization difficult; and

"Whereas we believe that the existing laws for the regulation of immigration and naturalization fully suffice to subvert the alleged dangers which the promoters of violent measures advocate in justification of their demand, all that is necessary to keep out dangerous elements being strict execution of the existing laws; and

"Whereas immigration has built up this country and made it great; and
 "Whereas it is a historical fact that when treason threatened to destroy our Republic the alien-born citizens willingly volunteered to sacrifice their life-blood for the preservation of the Union; and

"Whereas it is our firm conviction and belief that the passage of any such bill would do immeasurable damage to the natural growth and to the prosperity of the United States; and

"Whereas such policy would demonstrate a marvelous misconception of republican institutions and in some respects inaugurate an era of despotism:
 Therefore,

"Be it resolved, That we, the delegates of the Nordamerikanische Turnbund, solemnly and most earnestly protest against all legislation which would interfere with the eternal human right of a free man to select his own abode.

"Furthermore be it resolved, That we, the Turners of the United States of America, announce in our fourteenth biennial convention that we pledge ourselves to use our entire influence and all legal and honest means whatsoever to secure the defeat of every candidate (regardless of party) who will not prior to the election pledge himself to actively oppose any effort to restrict immigration and render naturalization more difficult than under the existing laws; and finally,

"Be it resolved, To send a copy of these resolutions to the Joint Congressional Committee on Immigration and Naturalization."

By order of the convention:

HENRY BRAUN, President.
 VICTOR L. BERGER, First Secretary.

To the honorable JOINT CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEE ON IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION, Washington, D. C.

FARMERS' ALLIANCE, NORTH DAKOTA.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present and to have printed in the RECORD resolutions of the North Dakota Farmers' Alliance, asking for the passage of a law prohibiting the importation of intoxicating liquors, and also of a law prohibiting the transportation of mail matter addressed to lottery companies.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The resolutions are as follows:

Resolutions passed by North Dakota Farmers' Alliance, June 4, 5, 1890.

Resolved, That we favor the passage of an act by Congress prohibiting the importation of intoxicating liquors into States where the sale of such liquors is illegal.

That we urge upon Congress the importance of enacting such legislation as will so far as possible restrict the operations of lotteries in the United States, and that we request Senators GILBERT A. PIERCE and LYMAN R. CASEY and Hon. H.
 C. HANSBROUGH, member of the House of Representatives from this State, to use all honorable means to secure the passage of such laws as are recommended in the circular of the Anti-Lottery League of Louisiana.

That we recommend the passage of the subtreasury bill, or something better, by our national Representatives.

That we urge the passage of the Butterworth bill and the Conger land bill.
 That we recommend the unlimited coinage of silver.

Attest:

M. D. WILLIAMS,
 Secretary North Dakota Alliance.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 2361) for the relief of Asa Ellis, collector of internal revenue for the first collection district of California;

A bill (H. R. 3886) to incorporate the North River Bridge Company and to authorize the construction of a bridge and approaches at New York City across the Hudson River, to regulate commerce in and over such bridge between the States of New York and New Jersey, and to establish such bridge a military and post road;

A bill (H. R. 8149) to increase the limit of cost of the public building authorized by act of Congress approved March 2, 1889, to be erected at Fort Worth, Tex.; and

A bill (H. R. 8677) to authorize the county of Pulaski, in the State of Georgia, to maintain a high wagon and foot bridge across the Ocmulgee River at or near Hawkinsville, in the State of Georgia.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which concurrence was requested, bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 5986) to provide for an additional associate justice of the supreme court of the Territory of New Mexico; and

A bill (H. R. 8245) to provide for the disposal of the abandoned reservations in Wyoming Territory.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed with amendment the bill (H. R. 1104) to relieve Peter Moog from the charge of desertion, asked a conference with the House on the bill and amendment, and had appointed Mr. COCKRELL, Mr. MANDERSON, and Mr.
 STEWART conferees on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore then (at 5 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.), acting under an order heretofore made, declared the House in recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m. and was called to order by Mr. PETERS as Speaker pro tempore.

FEDERAL ELECTION LAW.

According to order, the House resumed the consideration of the bill
 (H. R. 11045) to amend and supplement the election laws of the United States, etc.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, in the discussion of this bill I desire to submit a few observations which occur to me in following the remarks of my distinguished colleagues from New York [Mr. FLOWER and Mr.

 CUMMINGS]. They have characterized this bill, not only on the floor of this House, but in connection with their Democratic colleagues from the Northern part of the United States—north of the Ohio and Potomac Rivers—as "revolutionary, dangerous, and extraordinary," and they charge that it is proposed by the leaders of the party in power for the purpose of taking away from the existing power in the States the control of Federal elections.

Now, it seems to me that is not a fair, just, or reasonable construction of this bill. The proposition contained in the pending bill is to secure to every American citizen, wherever he may reside, North or South, East or West, the right to cast his ballot as he chooses and to have his vote counted as it is cast. I want to call the attention of the House and of the country to the fact that on next Tuesday, the 1st of July, there will go into operation, in the State of New York, a law, which was passed by the Legislature of that State and approved by the governor on the 2d day of May last, entitled "An act to promote the independence of voters at public elections, to enforce the secrecy of the ballot, and provide for the printing and distribution of ballots at public expense." This act is far more extensive in its operation, reaches vastly further than anything proposed in the bill now pending before the House of Representatives.

It is contended that this bill will be an improper and unjustifiable interference with citizens in the exercise of the right of suffrage. I contend, Mr. Speaker, that it is far short of what it might be and far short of what it should be in the estimation of many friends of protection to the right of suffrage.

For many years the Republican party, in its national and State platforms, has promised to the people of the United States legislation in the direction contemplated by the bill now before us. I think it is most important in its scope. I think it is entitled to the fairest and most candid consideration.

It appeals to the strongest sympathies of our nature when any man's rights as a citizen or as a voter, a freeman, are proposed to be affected by unfriendly or unfavorable legislation. The purpose of this legislation is not to take away the rights of a single citizen, but it is to insure those rights to him regardless of color, regardless of his circumstances or condition in life, so long as he may be qualified under the Constitution and the laws to exercise that right.

In the course of this debate allusion has been made to the enforcement and operation of the supervisors' law, which is proposed to be enlarged, amended, and supplemented by the pending bill. My honored colleague from New York [Mr. FLOWER] I believe felt constrained to criticize the existing law as enforced in New York, or professed to believe that no occasion exists or ever existed for its application and enforcement in my State.

The gentlemen forget the facts of history when they assert that no frauds have ever been practiced upon the right of suffrage in the Empire State. The facts are that gigantic frauds in aid of the Democratic party, conceived and brought forth in iniquity by its leaders, were uncovered in 1868 and subsequent years, and the recollection of those great wrongs is fresh in the minds of multitudes—even in the minds of my Democratic colleagues upon this floor to-day. Ten years after their occurrence, namely, 1879, they were the subject of attention and discussion in the Legislature of New York, in the celebrated contest of Brodsky against Patterson, in the eighth assembly district.

I chanced to be the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections and wrote the report, after hearing the evidence which revealed anew those frauds which, fortunately, were detected and their repetition and continuance prevented, through the able and efficient efforts of Mr. John I. Davenport, who had been the subject of so much Democratic vituperation during all the succeeding years and who continues in office fearlessly contending for the enforcement of honest election laws in New York and elsewhere.

It is a matter of history, Mr. Speaker, that in the month of October, 1868, over sixty thousand fraudulent certificates of naturalization were issued in the supreme and superior courts alone in the city of New York, almost entirely by two judges.

The following-named "professional witnesses" are shown by the records of the courts to have appeared the following number of times as witnesses to the good moral character and period of residence in the country of applicants:

	Persons.
Owen Gannon, for.....	360
Michael Marrow, for.....	403
John McGinnis, for.....	568
Joseph Moore, for.....	536
James McCabe, for.....	619
Thomas Salkeld, for.....	692
Patrick McCaffrey, for.....	692
John Ward, for.....	1,099
John Moran, for.....	1,597
Patrick Goff, for.....	2,162
Total.....	8,468

Before one judge alone (Barnard) Patrick Goff is shown by the court records to have appeared on the days below set forth for the number of persons mentioned:

	Persons.
On October 9, for.....	325
On October 10, for.....	391
On October 12, for.....	397

Total in three days..... 1,073

Two men, still living, each had and disposed of by sale ten thousand certificates signed and sealed in blank.

Before Judge Barnard, on October 12, when Patrick Goff appeared as a witness for three hundred and fifty-seven persons, he gave in the papers to which the judge affixed his fiat thirteen different streets as his residence.

On thirty-four of the three hundred and fifty-seven occasions when he appeared that day before the court he gave his residence in the following-mentioned places the several times set opposite thereto:

From 44 Greene street, six times.
From 44 Thompson street, six times.
From 44 Canal street, five times.
From 44 Wooster street, five times.
From 44 Madison street, two times.
From 44 Prince street, two times.
From 44 James street, one time.
From 44 Thames street, one time.
From 44 Rose street, one time.
From 44 Laurens street, one time.
From 44 Thomas street, one time.
From 44 East Houston street, one time.

Thirteen different residences, each the same street number and each a different street.

No. 79 Greene street, then a common bawdy house, was given, as appears by the files of the courts, as the residence of forty-two applicants for citizenship, each one of whom was admitted thereto, Owen Gannon appearing as a witness for twenty-three and James McCabe for nineteen of them.

The following distinguished gentlemen appear by the records of the courts to have acted as witnesses for applicants: Governor John T. Hoffman, William M. Tweed, Peter B. Sweeney, Samuel G. Courtney (the then United States attorney), William H. Vanderbilt, and August Belmont (the then chairman of the Democratic national committee). The pretended signatures of these gentlemen are of course forgeries. They did not appear. Judge Barnard knew them well, and he knew they were not before him, but he affixed his fiat to their pretended affidavits and certified that they were there and directed citizen papers to be issued thereon.

Two thousand certificates signed and sealed in blank were sent to the State of Ohio through Adams Express Company.

In the superior court, Judge McCann admitted, as appears by the papers on file, seventy-two persons to become citizens where the papers to which his fiat is annexed set forth the fact that the applicant came to the country over age and had declared his intentions to become a citizen, but that two years had not elapsed since such declaration was made. In many of these cases the papers show that but a few weeks had passed since the declaration was made, and one paper is on the files of the court which on the face shows that but two days had gone by. Yet all these persons were made American citizens.

But some gentleman may say all these things occurred in the "long ago." True, but the wrong was done and has been attempted since. During the Tilden and Hayes campaign in 1876 the same sort of work was started, but Mr. Davenport and his assistant officials broke it up and sent some ten of those engaged in that scheme to prison. It must be remembered, moreover, that many of those fraudulent naturalization papers of 1868 are still scattered throughout the country, and upon them thousands base their citizenship. I saw many of those papers and the men who voted on them. They were before my committee in 1879.

Strange, indeed, Mr. Speaker, that the wrongs thus perpetrated should have been solely in the interest of the very party which to-day opposes so bitterly a law to secure to every lawful voter the right to vote and have his vote counted as cast! Strange, indeed, that the Democratic party should be here solidly opposing a measure intended simply to secure to every citizen every citizen's constitutional right! Stranger, indeed, that the Representatives of that party north of the Ohio and Potomac Rivers should unite in such a proclamation as we find in the morning paper!

So, Mr. Speaker, I must confess that I was greatly surprised to find in the morning paper the manifesto signed by our distinguished Representatives on the Democratic side, north of the Ohio and Potomac Rivers—surprised the more that this paper does not appear to appeal to the sentiment of Southern men, but is addressed to Northern Democrats, to members of the Democratic party north of the rivers named. Now, why is this? Why should our honored friends from the South be excluded from participating in this proclamation? Is it because they contemplate issuing a new and revised proclamation addressed exclusively to the Southern people? If that be so, Mr. Speaker, I think it is incumbent upon me to suggest a draught of a proclamation that shall go to our friends, not only in the South, but in the North as well.

Mr. SAYERS. Before my friend reads that, I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. BAKER. Certainly.

Mr. SAYERS. Can you explain why the committee in the preparation of this bill, which, as claimed, is for the purpose of keeping elections pure all over the United States, did not provide for protection against the immense expenditure of money in elections in my friend's portion of the country?

Mr. BAKER. I wish to say to my friend that in the law passed by the Legislature of New York during the last winter, which was signed by the idol of the Democratic party, Governor Hill—

Mr. SAYERS. It is this bill I am talking about.

Mr. BAKER. Very well; this bill provides for the protection of elections under the laws of the United States and in conformity with the provisions of the statutes of any State—

Mr. SAYERS. Do you not think that bribery and corruption at elections are just as bad as force and intimidation?

Mr. BAKER. Perhaps a great deal worse in some respects. But intimidation is the worst imaginable, it seems to me, as conducted in many of the States.

Mr. SAYERS. Was my friend ever present at any election in the Southern States?

Mr. BAKER. There is no trouble about this matter. This legislation will secure justice; it will protect the right of suffrage.

Now, coming back to the subject of the proclamation which appears in the morning papers and is addressed exclusively to Northern Democrats, I suppose our friends representing the Southern Democratic districts will want to send their proclamation to their constituents and have it show what they have accomplished during this session of Congress. So, I want to suggest in all candor and fairness to my friends, because I know they will appreciate it, a proclamation something like this:

"The Representatives of the Democratic party in the Fifty-first Congress, to the people of the United States, greeting:

"Your Representatives engaged in their labors as statesmen, as conservators of the Constitution and the laws, as stop-gates of the flood of Republican extravagance and profligacy, take this occasion to congratulate the country upon the success with which their labors have thus far been crowned.

"They desire to call attention to a few of the chief master-pieces of legislative enactments which they have accomplished, or, if not accomplished, which the Democratic minority in Congress have in good faith endeavored to secure, though overpowered by a Republican majority, led by a 'tyrannical, usurpator, and revolutionary' Speaker, who, under the poor pretext of constitutional sanction, has assumed to give such construction of general parliamentary law, supplemented by a revised edition of the Code of Rules, as to defeat the high Democratic function of 'filibustering' and deny to us, the representatives of the Democracy, that most sacred of all Democratic legislative rights, the power to make dilatory motions and thus prevent a Republican majority from maintaining their assertion that the constitutional mission and duty of Congress are 'to do business.'

"Your minority endeavored in good faith and in an orderly fashion to prevent the enactment by the House of Representatives of the present Code of Rules, but were overpowered and defeated therein, notwithstanding the fact that in language as silver tongued and bland as could be deliberately uttered, we gently intimated of the Speaker that he was the 'worst tyrant that ever presided over a deliberative body,' and we feared his rulings would be criticised as 'usurpator, revolutionary, and corrupt,' while the distinguished gentleman from Alabama innocently inquired 'whether the Representatives of the people must remain silent in their seats and see the Speaker of this House inaugurate revolution.'

"Following the adoption of these rules, thus mildly resisted, the wheels of legislation began their daily revolutions which we have closely watched, though carefully refraining from improper familiarity with the machine.

"Your Representatives have faithfully but vainly resisted the passage of the bill to revise the tariff, conscious all the time that the eyes of England and the Canadian Provinces were upon us, praying for the success of our efforts.

"In the contest over that iniquitous measure, which is so distasteful to every foreign and Democratic lover of free trade, we were all but victorious, though not quite so, one substantial fruit thereof being the 'decoration of honor' conferred by the Speaker upon our honored leader and prospective candidate for the Speakership of the next Democratic House of Representatives, in which fruit your Representatives participated by clustering with unparalleled bravery around our hero while the latter was being 'decorated.'

"We earnestly and solidly opposed and voted against the admission of Wyoming and sat silent upon the passage of the bill to admit Idaho (following the example of our leaders in the Fiftieth Congress, when four new States were admitted in spite of our opposition and through the treachery of less than a score of our fellow-Democrats).

"We confidently expect the support of the women of Wyoming and the whole country next fall, while our Republican friends concede that the Mormon vote of Idaho and Utah will be a unit for our success.

"We will continue our Democratic missionary labors henceforth on Utah, New Mexico, and Arizona, assured (as we were in the cases of the four States) that those Territories will come in as Democratic members of the family of States.

"Your minority stubbornly, almost unanimously, and successfully resisted the passage, under suspension of the rules, of the Morrill pension bill with its assurance of increasing the pension-roll by four hundred thousand names and the disbursement thereunder of more than forty millions of dollars additional, annually, to the veterans, their widows, and dependent parents. We are proud to say that in that effort we were successful as we were when the bill for the relief of the ex-prisoners of war was in like manner brought forward for passage.

"The Democratic party is and will be entitled to all credit for the enactment of any past, present, or future legislation in behalf and recognition of the services and sacrifices of the brave men who fought the battles of the war for the Union.

"Though our Democratic leaders of the South did not exactly vote in harmony with our party on those questions in the present House, we were enabled to command the votes of enough independent Republicans to press the bill to a successful passage.

"We point with pride to the gallant struggle your representatives have made to uphold and maintain the right of the Democracy in West Virginia, Arkansas, and Florida to manage and conduct their elections in their own way. We promise to cling to our right to the use of the double-barreled shotgun and double-slotted ballot-box, as justifiable and legitimate methods of defending our party against the outrages of Republican interference.

"In this good work the two wings of our party ever have worked and ever will work in perfect harmony.

"The methods practiced by our Democratic brethren of the South may be criticised by our political enemies, but the votes of an undivided Democracy always have been and always will be heard in this House in sustaining such methods as rights guaranteed by the Constitution and laws—particularly by the latter.

"We congratulate the party upon the fact that, while our enemies in the late civil unpleasantness were, by our consent, engaged in decorating the graves of the men who fell in defense of what they deemed a just cause, our friends, who met with temporary defeat, were enabled, after twenty-five years of silence, to revive the fallen flag and glorify anew the 'lost cause' in the city last to surrender in '65.

"In view of these and other facts and circumstances which are not necessary to be referred to at this time, your representatives appeal to the country to restore to power, so far as may be, the Democratic party by electing a Democratic House of Representatives in the Fifty-second Congress, admonishing the people that while we promise nothing we may always be relied upon to do as we promise." [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. SAYERS. Is that your speech?

Mr. BAKER. This is a proclamation that I would suggest for our friends on the other side which they may send to their Democratic constituencies. [Laughter.]

Mr. ENLOE. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think he is putting a little too much truth in that. [Laughter.]

Mr. SAYERS. It is just about as correct as a good Republican can make it.

Will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. BAKER. Certainly.

Mr. SAYERS. How many times during the Fiftieth Congress did you sit in that Congress and refuse to vote?

Mr. BAKER. Why I do not think I did on a single occasion. But, if you want to compare this side with that, I will confess that you are away ahead of us. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, these are merely suggestions, of course, and it is not obligatory upon my Democratic friends to utilize them; but I thought it proper to aid them, in a mild way at least, in getting up some satisfactory literature which they could disseminate amongst their constituents.

They are mere suggestions for the benefit of my Democratic friends from the South, and I want them to follow this proclamation, contained in the morning paper and to go out to the country alongside of it. This may be signed by all of the Democrats on that side. The one that you find in the paper this morning is only signed by a portion of the Democratic party. Now, it indicates to my mind that there must be a division in the party on that point and that our friends are not united in their opposition to this bill, so far at least as that paper indicates.

I should like to see this go out alongside of the suggestions I have made, and I will incorporate it in my remarks for that purpose. These two will form exceedingly interesting reading to the country. The pith of the argument contained in the document sent out this morning is that this bill is not constitutional.

Now, seriously, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, there can be no well grounded argument in favor of its unconstitutionality. It is entirely in harmony with the Constitution as well as with Republican pledges made to the country from time immemorial, and we have aimed in this measure to provide a way by which the sacredness of the ballot and the right of suffrage shall be secured and protected to all the citizens in the land.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANDLEE, of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I can not, in the limited time allotted me, enter into an elaborate argument of this measure in all its bearings. I will not, therefore, stop to discuss its constitutionality, but will leave that question to be discussed by those more learned in the law than I am, contenting myself with saying that, in my judgment, it would not, if enacted into law, bear the scrutiny of judicial investigation.

I do not hope to be able, by anything I can say, to change the preconceived opinions of the gentlemen on the other side of this House who are giving it so earnest a support, but I can not let the record, which is to be handed down to posterity, be made up without entering thereon my most earnest protest against a measure so fraught with destruction to the very first principles of local self-government.

For more than a hundred years no political party has thought it necessary to exercise the dangerous powers proposed in this bill.

Hitherto the conservatism, fairness, and patriotism of the people of the States have been deemed sufficient to insure, on this floor, fair representation of the popular sentiment of the several States; but now we are told that, to secure here a fair expression of the popular will in Georgia, Georgians can not be trusted to conduct their own elections, but agents of the General Government must be sent out to supervise them and see to it that our people have that which they are not wise enough nor honest enough to secure for themselves: a free election and a fair count.

There is a reason, Mr. Speaker, for this unprecedented interference in the election of the States, and this reason must be one of three things.

Those who propose this measure must do so either because they desire to secure a partisan advantage or to punish the people of the South, where alone the law would be practically operative, or because they desire to correct evils existing in the electoral systems of the States which they can not correct themselves.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I beg leave to interrupt the gentleman. I wish to say to him that we at the North insist that it will be applicable at the North.

Mr. CANDLEE, of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his suggestion; it will be applicable at the North; but at the same time I beg leave to repeat my language, that this bill, in my judgment, will be practically operative only in the Southern States. That, I mean to say, is the object of the bill. If there had been no Southern States there would have been no election bill in the Fifty-first Congress of the United States. The friends of the measure, actuated by fanatical and partisan motives, want to reach the South, and in order to do so, Sampson like, they pull down the temple upon their own heads.

They have not, and it seems they can not, learn wisdom from experience. Unbridled party spirit has been the bane of every representative government since the dawn of civilization.

Party spirit banished Aristides, the bravest and justest of Athenians. Party spirit banished Catiline from Rome, when his crimes were, perhaps, no greater than those of the partisans of Cicero.

Party spirit beheaded Charles I, inaugurated the reign of Cromwell and the Puritans, and finally restored the monarchy and established Charles II on the throne; but not until England had been devastated and her manhood decimated. The same unbridled spirit inaugurated the French revolution, deluged Paris in blood, and shook to its foundations every throne in Europe.

In this, our own country, the same evil has existed from the inauguration of the Government down to this day. It appeared before the close of the first Administration under the Constitution, and has been the prime cause of all the convulsions which have, on more than one occasion, threatened the life of this Republic. And strange enough this baleful spirit has always manifested itself first in that section from which this bill emanates.

The Puritans who settled New England sought an abode in the wilds of the Western world to escape persecution and enjoy religious freedom. It has been said that they at once proceeded to enjoy that freedom to its fullest extent by persecuting every one who did not agree with them and to regulate their own affairs by meddling with the affairs of everybody else.

After they had exterminated all the witches and scourged and driven from their borders all the Baptists and Quakers and Catholics, and thus established perfect religious freedom, they turned their attention to their more distant neighbors, and, with a self-sacrificing devotion unparalleled in history, have ever since labored diligently and unceasingly to regulate the affairs of other people, regardless of the consequences to their own.

But I said, Mr. Speaker, that the object of the bill must be to correct evils actually existing in the electoral systems of the States or to punish the South or to perpetuate the power of the dominant party.

It can not be that the friends of this measure believe that such a law is necessary to secure fair elections. Indeed, each of the gentlemen who have spoken for the bill has been careful to say that in his district elections are fair and that in it there is no need for Federal supervision. It is always in some other section that the law is needed.

We concede that they know the needs of their own districts, and we claim that we know more of the situation in ours than they do, and in them there is no need for this law, because no unprejudiced man, come he from whatever quarter of the Union he may, can witness our elections in that section and come to any other conclusion than that they are the fairest held any where in this Republic. This is the unanimous verdict of all fair-minded men who have come to the South from any other sections of the Republic and settled among us and observed our methods and studied the situation as it is. True, in our section there are, as everywhere else on the face of the earth, occasional conflicts between men. True, we, at long intervals, have scenes of strife, and even bloodshed and riot, such as that at Birmingham, Ala., a few months ago, when the populace was wrought up by one of the most fiendish crimes ever enacted in any community. But there was no race question involved; there was no politics in the case.

Election riots, never prevalent in the South, have been almost unknown since the dark days of reconstruction, when armed soldiers lorded it insolently over the disfranchised manhood of that section. There is in Georgia, and the same may be said so far as I know and believe of every other Southern State, no shotgun policy, no intimidation, no coercion, no force or fraud or violence at the polls. Sober men seldom engage in political riots, unarmed men never do, and in Georgia to sell, give, or otherwise furnish intoxicants within two miles of a polling place during an election, and for twelve hours before it begins, is a crime punished by heavy penalties. To carry arms to an election is a crime punished by penalties equally heavy. There is no debauching of voters with whisky. There is no coercion of voters by physical force. The use of money to influence elections is far less frequent in the South than in any other section of the country. There is by far more of the true, pristine, Americanism and love of fair play there than anywhere else on the continent. Thinking, unprejudiced men everywhere see and acknowledge this.

The population of the South, the white population, are the descendants of the men of the Revolution. The institution of slavery kept out immigration from foreign countries. All the immigration we had was from the other American States, from New England and the Middle States, true American blood. That blood has been kept pure there, and is now purer than anywhere else in the Republic. The same spirit that animated your fathers and ours when they established this Government animates the white men of the South today. That hatred for oppression and love of justice and fair play which inspired your ancestors and ours when they formed this Government of equal rights to all, special privileges to none, still inspire the white man of that section. There is no animosity in their breasts towards the negro. They are his best friends, and he begins to realize it. In our courts he has every right the white man has. In our schools he has equal privileges with our own children. In our poverty we have imposed heavy taxes on ourselves to educate his children as our own are educated. In everything we have made him equal before the law except in social status. This is not a subject for legislation. Every community must and does regulate the social status of its members for itself. Oil and water will not mix. People of different natures, but of the same race, mix harmoniously and without distinction and form a single community, but people of different races never do. They naturally and instinctively segregate themselves and form separate communities even in the same town. In this city the white people constitute socially one community, the negroes another, and the Mongolians another. There is no statute law that separates the three races into three separate communities. It is not their color that does it. In the eyes of the law the life, the liberty, and the property of the black man are as sacred as those of the white, and those of the yellow man are as sacred as those of either. Community of tastes, habits, and idiosyncrasies governs social organizations. The negro or the Chinaman is ill at ease in a social gathering of white men. The white man is uncomfortable in a social gathering of negroes or Chinamen.

Still, under the laws of the United States and of every State their legal rights are identical, and nowhere are those of the negro more fully recognized and carefully guarded than in the South. Everywhere wealth has advantages over poverty. In Massachusetts the poor man who goes into the court a litigant against the rich man is, to a certain extent, at a disadvantage. To the same extent, but no further, the poor negro who goes into court against a rich white man in the South is at a disadvantage. There is no discrimination against him on account of his color. His only disadvantage is that incurred by him in common with his white neighbor by reason of his poverty and ignorance. That he is often influenced in exercising his right to vote by the more intelligent with whom he comes in contact is true, but that he is controlled more frequently or by means other than those employed by the intelligent everywhere, North and South, to influence the votes of the weaker and less intelligent is untrue. The truth of this assertion is established abundantly by the testimony of almost every man who has come from the old free States of the North and settled in the South since the war.

No intelligent man can doubt the veracity or the loyalty to the Republican party of such men as Governor Bullock, the only Republican governor Georgia has ever had, and General Longstreet, who incurred the anathemas of his own people by becoming a Republican in the dark and stormy days of reconstruction. These and many other Republicans of equal character and ability testify to the truth of what I have said. Republican members of Congress now here on this floor corroborate this testimony. They have done so openly here to-day. They are the equals in veracity of those of you who favor this bill, and their opportunity for knowing the true situation in the South has been far better than yours.

The truth of the matter, Mr. Speaker, is that the average plantation negro has never appreciated his responsibility as a citizen. The ballot was thrust upon him when he was utterly and totally unprepared for it. He regards it as a bauble, a plaything, or an article of merchandise. He regards election day as a public holiday. He goes to the polls as he goes to the circus or to a public execution—for a frolic. If unapproached by any one, he would, in a majority of cases, go away without depositing his ballot. As it is, one-half of them can not tell you the day after the election for whom they voted. That there are many persons in the country who really believe that the negro vote in the South is suppressed, I concede. That there are gentlemen on this floor who honestly entertain the same opinion, I have no doubt. But they are mistaken. The fact that Democrats are sent here from districts having a heavy preponderance of negro population is not an evidence of the suppression of the negro vote. That there were frauds and irregularities in elections in the South soon after the close of the war of secession, before the animosities of that unhappy conflict had had time to cool, and when our young men were exasperated by the disfranchisement of their fathers and the enthronement of ignorance and venality, is doubtless true. But that these crimes have grown less and less frequent and that now their occurrence is as rare as in any other portion of the country is equally true.

The negro is a docile animal and is much more susceptible to influences than his white neighbor. He knows nothing of the theory of our Government and cares less. The man who treats him kindly and seeks to control his vote can always do so. When he was at first converted from a slave into a free man and given the ballot at the same time that it was taken away from his master and the polling places were patrolled by armed soldiers, Southern white men, exasperated at the indignity, refused to solicit his vote and suffered the carpet-baggers and native scalawags to take possession of him and the polls. In doing so they made a dangerous mistake which they soon realized and hastened to correct. Now, they understand that a negro vote counts as much as that of a white man, and the men who frequent the polls for the purpose of carrying elections do not hesitate to approach him as they do the white voter to solicit his vote. The negro appreciates the attention and is easily influenced. Moreover, his twenty-five years of freedom has not been without its lessons to him. Many of the more intelligent of them have learned that their interests, in a State in which the law makes no distinction on account of race or color, are identical with those of their white neighbors, and since to vote the white man's ticket will give them a better standing with the white man they do so cheerfully.

But, Mr. Speaker, to go no further into details, intelligence everywhere and under all circumstances dominates ignorance. The negro is admitted by all, I believe, to be an inferior race intellectually. The Caucasian is admitted everywhere to be the superior race, and as intelligence always dominates ignorance the white man will always dominate the negro when the two races are brought in contact. This idea can not be more strongly enforced than in the language of a distinguished Republican [Senator INGALLS] at the other end of this Capitol. He says:

The race to which we belong is the most arrogant and rapacious, the most exclusive and indomitable in history. It is the conquering and unconquerable race, through which alone man has taken possession of the moral and physical world. To our race humanity is indebted for religion, for literature, for civilization. It has a genius for conquest, for politics, for jurisprudence, and for administration. The home and family are its contributions to society. Individualism, fraternity, liberty, and equality have been its contributions to the state. All other races have been its enemies or its victims.

This, sir, is not the time, nor is this the occasion to consider the profoundly interesting question of the unity of races. It is sufficient to say that, either by instinct or design, the Caucasian race at every step of its progress from barbarism to enlightenment has refused to mingle its blood or assimilate with the two other great human families, the Mongolian and the African, and has persistently rejected admixture. It has found the fullest and most complete realization of its fundamental ideas of government and society upon this continent, and there can be no doubt that upon this arena its future and most magnificent triumphs are to be accomplished.

This, sir, is a true statement of the case. The Caucasian race always has been and always will be the ruling race where it exists, and it ought to be. Intelligence always has and always will and always ought to rule, because it is better fitted to rule. It can do it, and does do it, in the South, by legitimate means. Southern intelligence controls the negro vote, so far as it is controlled, by the same means by which Northern intelligence controls the ignorant and uneducated vote in the Northern States. Gentlemen who entertain any other opinion are mistaken. They have not lived among us and do not know the situation. They have formed their opinions on unreliable testimony.

There are in the South, as everywhere else, bad men. Some of these men are white and some are black. Many of them are Republicans. Their testimony is that upon which you base your conclusions. You either will not hear or, having heard, you reject as unworthy of belief the testimony of honest, unprejudiced men of the South, both native and Northern born. You forget that these men whom you reject as liars and perjurers are the descendants of the men who with their blood and treasure had an equal part with your ancestors in planting the tree of liberty and equality in the Western world. You forget that Southern blood flowed freely on every battlefield of the Revolution; that Southern brains contributed largely to the formation of the Constitution of our country. A Southern mind conceived and a Southern hand wrote the Declaration of Independence. A Southern man led your armies to victory in that memorable conflict.

In the second war with Great Britain the South contributed more than her share to the triumph of the American arms. A Southern man again led your armies to victory and covered your flag with glory.

Later on, in the war with Mexico, the South again did more than her share and Southern chieftains planted the Stars and Stripes on the battlements of the Mexican capital.

The South has always been loyal to the Constitution.

When molders of public opinion in the North were denouncing that instrument as "a covenant with hell and a league with death," the South revered and defended it. When at last driven to action, in defense of an institution for which she was not primarily responsible, but which she had inherited, and in which she had invested $2,000,000,000, the accumulations of two hundred years, she was still loyal to the Constitution and took a copy of it as the fundamental law of the Confederacy which she attempted in vain to establish.

Mr. Speaker, there never has been a day when the people of the section to be proscribed by this bill were not loyal to the Constitution of our country and the principles of free government. And it is these people, thus loyal, who are striving to solve the most difficult problem ever submitted to a people for solution, who are disparaged and balked, and whose testimony is to be rejected as unworthy of belief. It is these people, with such a history and such a record of devotion to the principles of free government, who are to be proscribed and put under the ban as incapable of self-government.

To assume that elections in the South are unfair in spite of the protests of such a people, and on the unsupported testimony of a few unscrupulous adventurers moved by a desire for the emoluments of office, is unfair, unjust, and unreasonable, and I do not believe the American people will sustain such an assumption.

The evils of which you complain and upon which you rely to sustain you in this revolutionary action are much more imaginary than real and are growing less and less every day. This you are obliged to see; this you are obliged to know, and this, but for partisan blindness, you would be obliged to admit. It is not therefore the existence of real evils that prompts you to pass this bill. Other motives must be found for your action. Is it, then, a desire to punish the South still further for her abortive attempt at secession? If we did, indeed, as you charge, inaugurate "the most causeless and wicked rebellion in the annals of the world," have we not been sufficiently punished? Have we in vain submitted to all the humiliations and all the indignities of reconstruction? Have we in vain kept our paroles and relied on the plighted faith of your generals to whom we surrendered? Have we in vain submitted without compensation to the destruction of $3,000,000,000 of our property, to say nothing of the 150,000 of the flower of our youth and manhood slaughtered on the battle-field? Do we in vain, in our poverty and desolation, uncomplainingly contribute $30,000,000 a year to pension the men who invaded and devastated our homes and desolated our hearthstones?

Mr. Speaker, the annals of the world furnish no instance in which a subjugated people have submitted more uncomplainingly to the domination of the conqueror. Many of you think your conduct towards us has been magnanimous. I give you credit for sincerity in this belief, but put yourselves in our place and it may modify your opinion. You do not go far enough back in your inquiry. You only go back to 1860. You fail to read in the history of seventy years preceding the war of secession our devotion to the Constitution and the Union in spite of the most irritating provocations. The history of the world shows but few instances in which the provocation to revolution was so great as in this. The provocation of our fathers to rebellion against the British Crown was not half so great. I do not desire to open any old wounds. I do not desire to irritate any old sores. The people of the South and their Representatives here have never desired to do any of these things. When our armies surrendered they surrendered in good faith. They appealed to the arbitrament of the sword and the decision was against them, and they have without murmur or complaint abided the decision. Nowhere since Appomattox has any opposition been offered to the authority of the General Government. Everywhere has its dominion in its proper sphere been supreme and unquestioned. Here on this floor our Representatives have sat for twenty-five years and heard themselves and their people denounced as "traitors" and "red-handed rebels."

We have been maligned and slandered without justice and without mercy. The old war cries of the stormy days of the revolution have been revived. Much has been said even at this session of Congress about "plantation manners," and that most, to some gentlemen, terrible of all yells, "the rebel yell." In the face of all this we have counseled forbearance and moderation among our people. On the escutcheon of Georgia is emblazoned, "Wisdom, justice, and moderation." We have tried to conform our conduct to that legend. We have tried to be wise, to be just, to be moderate. But, Mr. Speaker, whatever its character, whether an act of loyalty to or treason against the Constitution, secession was not a plant of Southern growth. The right was recognized by all men of every shade of political opinion while the men who framed the Constitution lived. Indeed some of the States in their ordinances adopting it as the fundamental law expressly reserved that right. Most of those making that reservation were Northern States.

Secession as a remedy for real or imaginary grievances was first threatened by New England, the section from which the distinguished author of this bill [Mr. LODGE] comes. It was recognized as a legitimate remedy in the Hartford convention. No Southern man sat in that convention. All were New Englanders, the descendants of the Puritans.

Slavery, for which the South is not alone responsible and which has been the Iliad of all our woes at the South, made its appearance as a disturbing element in the convention which framed the Constitution. In that convention the right of property in African slaves was recognized, and provision for the rendition of fugitive slaves was made in the organic law of the Union. To have done otherwise would have defeated the very object for which the convention was assembled, the formation of a constitutional union of the States; because before the Constitution could be operative and the union effective, nine States had to adopt it, and this would not have been done without that clause, for at that time there were but thirteen States and slavery existed in twelve of them. Indeed, at that time the institution was held to more tenaciously in some of the Northern States than it was farther south.

Georgia, which lost more by the results of the war than any other State and in whose borders there are to-day more negroes than in any other, was the last of the American colonies to admit slavery. For sixteen years she excluded it. If it was an unmitigated evil and a crime against humanity, we of the South were not alone responsible for it. Our brethren farther north were equally guilty. Their money was invested in the slave trade. Slave ships sailed from their ports, and we are told it was at the instance of Northern members of the convention that the African slave-trade was tolerated until the year 1803. It was at their instance that this provision was put into the Constitution. To say the least of it, both sections were equally responsible for the existence of slavery. It was an institution existing, as has been said, in twelve of the thirteen States which entered into the compact which we call the Constitution. Each party to that compact bound itself to protect the institution by the rendition of fugitive slaves who might escape from their masters and be found in their borders. Each State which entered the Union was bound as much by this part of the Constitution as by any other. Each State which failed to comply with the obligations imposed on it by this clause was disloyal to the Constitution. When they adopted that instrument they adopted it as a whole and were bound by all of its parts. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] says:

No people can afford to write anything into their constitution and not sustain it.

Did they do it? Did they pass laws to restore fugitive slaves found in their limits to their owners? On the contrary, they refused to do so and passed laws to encourage our slaves to run away. The abolitionists, the fathers of the present Republican party, encouraged raids on the South and insurrection among our slaves. We appealed to the Supreme Court and were sustained. They proclaimed a higher law. Slavery was "morally wrong," and they could not conscientiously observe their oaths to support the Constitution. Their consciences were quickened, but, in the language of the distinguished Republican Senator at the other end of this Capitol [Mr. INGALLS], to whom I have before referred:

The conscience of New England never was thoroughly aroused to the immorality of African slavery until it ceased to be profitable, and the North did not determine to destroy the system until convinced that its continuance threatened not only their industrial independence, but their political supremacy.

Then, and not till then, did they discover the wrong of slavery. Then they forgot their obligation to the Constitution. Then they defied the power of the judiciary and set at naught the decisions of the Supreme Court. Then they passed laws to protect fugitive slaves in their borders and to punish as felons Southern men who attempted to recover their property. Here is the law of Vermont:

Every person who may have been held as a slave, who shall come or who may be brought into this State with the consent of his or her master or mistress, or who shall come or be brought or shall be in this State, shall be free.

Every person who shall hold or attempt to hold in this State in slavery, as a slave, any free person, in any form or for any time however short, under pretense that such person is or has been a slave, shall, on conviction thereof, be imprisoned in the State prison for a term not less than five years nor more than twenty years, and be fined not less than $1,000 nor more than $10,000.

Other States passed similar laws. Thirteen States utterly refused to comply with their constitutional obligations as to the rendition of fugitives. The decision of the Supreme Court was set at naught. We were excluded from the common territory of the Union, purchased by the common blood and the common treasure of the people. Emissaries were sent into our borders to incite our slaves to insurrection, arson, and murder. All this time the Southern people asked only for their constitutional rights. They were loyal to the Constitution and the flag. They only asked to be let alone in the enjoyment of the rights guaranteed to them in the compact. But this could not be. The higher-law doctrine prevailed. A President hostile to us and our rights under the Constitution was elected. The Republican party got control of the Government. A band of mutineers seized the ship of state and headed her towards another port than that to which the fathers started her. A dissolution of the Union was imminent. We wanted to go in peace. We wanted no war. Many of your own people and your own party conceded the right of peaceable secession. Many of the best people in the South deprecated the necessity for it. They loved the Union. In 1858 Mr. Toombs, in his Boston speech, while he admitted that he did not, told you 90 per cent. of them wanted to perpetuate it. He might have said truthfully 99 per cent.

A congress of the Union-loving people of all of the States was called at the instance of Virginia. The delegates assembled. The South demanded nothing new. She asked only a recognition of her rights under the Constitution as expounded by the highest tribunal of the land. She asked only to be let alone in the enjoyment of her rights as other States were let alone. Her demands were refused, and we were plainly told that our sister States did not intend to comply with the obligations voluntarily assumed by them in the compact of union. Thus, driven to the last extremity, the Southern States passed ordinances of secession. We were at once denounced as traitors and rebels. A war unprecedented in the annals of two thousand years was forced upon us. We met your armies on our own soil when you invaded it. To have done less we would have been cravens; to have done more we might have been what you call us, rebels. Perhaps we were rebels any how. If we were, ours was not a rebellion against the Constitution of the fathers. You rebelled against that. We rebelled against the domination of the Republican party. We are still rebels against it. We have never sworn allegiance to it nor its methods, and as long as there is an inch of the Constitution to stand on we never will. This is the head and front of our offending. For this for thirty years we have suffered. Our punishment has been all the most insatiate could demand. This proposed law, therefore, can not be intended for the further punishment of the South. Such a supposition would be unjust even to the Republican party.

If no evils exist requiring such a remedy and if the motives of those who are urging the passage of this monstrous measure be not a desire to still further punish the people of that section, it must be intended to perpetuate the power of the dominant party. It must be that, having despaired of being able to retain their hold on power by fair means, their leaders have grown desperate and are ready to resort to revolutionary measures.

To those who have observed the methods of some of the leaders of the Republican party of late, this is not astonishing. It is not surprising that men who are more loyal to their party than to their race or country should resort to high-handed and revolutionary methods to perpetuate their power. That this motive actuated the committee which reported this bill is apparent on the face of their report.

They say they "conceive that the fact that in many districts of the country elections are tainted and their result perverted by fraud, violence, or corruption is too well known to require in a report an elaboration of the evidence." They believe it to be also well known that, "whether fraud, violence, or corruption exists to the degree which is generally supposed or not, there can be no doubt that such is the popular belief," and therefore Congress must assume without proof that all the vile slanders prompted by hate and malignity which have for twenty-five years been published and industriously circulated by partisans and a partisan press are true, and that the South must be punished for them. Was there ever such a travesty on justice? Was there ever in the history of the world such fanaticism? The tribunal instituted to examine into and report on the guilt or innocence of the accused "do not feel that it is necessary to enter into a detailed argument." They have taken no testimony, and "do not feel that it is necessary" to do so. "Whether fraud, violence, and corruption exist or not, such is the popular belief," and therefore the accused community must be punished, not because they are guilty, but because they are accused.

When, Mr. Speaker, have injustice and prejudice gone so far? When has fanaticism gone so wild? Never in the history of legislation or jurisprudence but once. There is one, and only one, parallel in all history, and that was two thousand years ago, when the Jews crucified the Savior, not on proof of guilt, but to appease popular clamor. Now, in the same way, we of the South are to be crucified again, not because we have been proven guilty, but to appease the clamors of our enemies. This is the solemn judgment of the committee charged with the investigation of the question of our guilt or innocence.

This is the verdict of the jury impaneled and sworn "a true verdict to render according to the law and the evidence." Do you think, Mr. Speaker, the high court of appeals, the people, to whom we intend to carry this case, will sustain this verdict? We think not. There is too much love of honesty, and of justice, and of right in the American people for this. They may be hoodwinked and deceived for a time by fanatics and designing demagogues, but in the end they always do right; in the end they acquit the innocent and punish the guilty. To this tribunal we appeal, and woe to you and yours when their verdict is rendered.

I say it not hastily, nor to irritate or provoke, but deliberately, and with the full knowledge of the import of every word I employ. I have lived in the South for nearly three score years. I have been a constant voter at elections at which I was entitled to vote for nearly forty years. I was at the polls in my State at the secession elections, when party spirit ran high. I was at the polls at the reconstruction elections, when military satraps suppressed our constitutions and our laws, when armed soldiers patrolled the precincts, when men were blinded by passion; but at none of these elections have I ever seen a minority treated with that indignity that I have seen the minority on this floor treated at this session of Congress. I have never seen an individual voter, black or white, suppressed in the exercise of his rights as I have seen members of this House suppressed from that chair. I do not deny that there have been frauds at elections in the South. I do not deny that there have been occasions in the past when there was violence. These things occur everywhere. But I do declare I have never seen either. I do declare that both have grown and are growing less and less frequent in the South every day, and that now there is no more of either than exists in other States of the Union. I concede that many good men in the Republican party believe differently, but they have been deceived. Every mole-hill has been magnified into a mountain by partisans and a partisan press. Every drunken brawl in which drunken white men and drunken negroes were engaged has been magnified into a race riot. Every challenge of a disqualified voter, if he happened to be black, has been heralded as a suppression of the ballot. Unfortunately for us and the country, those from whom you get your information in the South are not good men. There are good men in the Republican party in that section, a few, such as Bullock and Longstreet, and they tell you the truth, but you do not believe them. You ignore their testimony and are misled by the noisy and unscrupulous gang who are Republicans only for the emoluments of office.

Good men in your party can not desire to punish us further on the testimony of such witnesses. Where there is a conflict in testimony even a criminal is entitled to the benefit of a reasonable doubt. You can certainly give us the rights you accord a felon. Not to do so would be unworthy even of the Republican party. A party that boasts of such mighty achievements can not without the loss of self-respect and the respect of the people attempt to perpetuate its power by such means. Some years ago the passage of a force bill was attempted, but the conservatism and manly courage of a few patriotic Republicans in this House defeated it. There are enough such Republicans here now to defeat this force bill. Their hearts prompt them to do it; their judgment impels them to this act of patriotism and justice. Nothing but a baneful party spirit stands in their way. Strangle this spirit; rise above it. Let your action be prompted by your hearts and your heads, and not by your prejudices.

This bill if it becomes a law can result in evil and evil only. It is full of peril as well to the whole Republic as to the South. The liberties of the white men in Massachusetts as well as those of the black men in Georgia are involved. When the one is imperiled the other is in danger.

The inevitable effect of such a law will be to revive race prejudice and race conflicts in the South, to renew the scenes of the reconstruction era, and rekindle passions now happily subdued. It will not strengthen the Republican party anywhere. The intelligence and conservatism of the country everywhere will condemn such an enactment and hold your party accountable for its results. If I was more of a partisan and less of a patriot, I would say, pass this bill; usurp the power of the people; trample on the Constitution and the usages of a century; reinaugurate the reconstruction era in the South; destroy the industrial interests of that section; render valueless the millions of money of your own people invested in our mines and factories and railroads. Thus they would open a fire in your rear as destructive to you as ours in your front. You would be hurled from power, and my party with its glorious memories would again assume the reins of government.

But, Mr. Speaker, I am not wholly a partisan. I love my party and glory in its achievements. It has always been the party of the Constitution and of the people. Its achievements have been grand and glorious. But, great as they have been, those of my country have been greater. Much as I love it, I love my country and my race more. I would do much to secure the triumph of my party but I would die, if need be, to protect the honor of my people and advance the glory of my country. And why not? It is my country as well as yours. The blood of my ancestors, as well as of yours, flowed on every battle-field of the Revolution. Some of them went from Georgia, some from Pennsylvania, some from North Carolina, and some from Maryland. But they were all there, and each contributed to the extent of his ability to the establishment of this Republic and the perpetuation of its glory.

Your blood and mine is derived from the same source. The achievements and glories of our ancestors constitute a common inheritance. We are one and the same people, and a common destiny awaits us. Why then let party spirit and the passions of an hour control our action? Rather let the good of each be the care of all. This will be patriotic, this will be wise, this will be for the general good. We at the South, your brethren, are confronted with a problem the greatest that ever confronted man. In our midst is an alien race, an inferior race, clothed with all the attributes of citizenship. From a slave he was in a twinkling converted into a sovereign. He was not ready for the sudden change. He was not by nature and education fitted to wield the ballot. But in the mistaken zeal of the hour it was given to him, and he will keep it.

Revolutions never go backwards. He would not willingly give it up and we who live with him are not willing for him to do so. Great as was the mistake of thrusting the ballot on him, unprepared as he was for it, the evil consequences of an attempt to take it from him now would be greater.

It is true that nowhere in the history of man can a record be found of two different races living on the same soil at the same time in peace, both clothed with all the privileges and immunities of citizenship.

Can we of the South do that which has never hitherto been accomplished? Can two races widely dissimilar live together in peace with equal political and civil rights? That is the problem in the solution of which we have made marvelous progress, under the most unfavorable conditions, within the last twenty-five years.

With the moral support of our own race elsewhere in the Republic we can do it. Without that support we will fail. If you will be as patient with us as we have been with the negro we shrink not from the task, but we must have at least your forbearance and sympathy. We do not ask your sympathy in an effort to deprive the negro of any right he has under the law. No such effort will be made. On the contrary, our endeavor has been and will be to protect him in his rights and prepare him for a wise and patriotic exercise of them. But, sir, we will never surrender our government into the hands of an inferior race. We would be unworthy of our lineage and of our heritage were we to do it. Our fixed and unalterable resolve is to protect the black man in his legal rights, but never to submit to his domination. I adopt the forcible language of another and tell you plainly—

The negro vote can never control the South, and it would be well if partisans at the North would understand this. I have seen the people of a State set about by black hosts until their fate seemed sealed. But, sir, some brave man, banding them together, would rise, as Elshah rose in beleaguered Samaria, and, touching their eyes with faith, bid them look abroad to see the very air filled with the chariots of Israel, and the horsemen thereof. If there is any human force that can not be withstood, it is the power of the banded intelligence and responsibility of a free community. Against it numbers and corruptions can not prevail. It is the unalterable right of every community, the just and righteous safeguard against an ignorant and corrupt suffrage. It is on this, sir, that we rely in the South—not the cowardly menace of mask or shot-gun, but the peaceful majesty of intelligence and responsibility, massed and united for the protection of its homes and the preservation of its liberty.

That, sir, is our reliance and our hope, and against it all the powers of the earth shall not prevail. It was just as certain that Virginia would come back to the unchallenged control of her white race—that before the moral and material power of her people once more united opposition would crumble until its last desperate leader was left alone vainly striving to rally his disordered hosts—as that night shall fade in the kindling glory of the sun. You may pass force bills, but they will not avail. You may surrender your own liberties to Federal election law; you may deliver your election machinery into the hands of the General Government, but never, sir, will a single State of this Union, North or South, be delivered again to the control of an ignorant and inferior race. We wrested our State government from negro supremacy when the Federal drum-beat rolled closer to the ballot-box and Federal bayonets hedged it deeper about than it will ever again be permitted in this free Government. But, sir, though the cannon of this Republic thundered in every voting district of the South, we still should find in the mercy of God the means and the courage to prevent its establishment.

This is the message delivered, Mr. Speaker, to the people of New England by a distinguished son of Georgia, who at the hour of its delivery stood "in the valley of the shadow of death." It was his last public utterance on earth. Within a fortnight he went down mourned by the entire South to an honored grave. He but voiced the sentiment of every honorable man in the South.

He was no incendiary. He was no partisan. He was no alarmist. He spoke the words of soberness and of truth from a brave heart full of love for his race and for his country. The South is full of men entertaining these sentiments. Let them alone and they will solve the race problem satisfactorily to you and the world. But slander them and malign them and obstruct them with force bills, and the consequences of their failure be on your heads. [Applause.]

Mr. BEOSIUS. Shall the citizens of the United States, in the exercise of their constitutional right to vote for the election of Representatives in Congress, be protected by national law from fear, force, or fraud? This question, like the prophet's rod, swallows all other national questions. A negative answer involves a proposition so revolting to justice and so abhorrent to reason and right conduct that it can not be adequately characterized in parliamentary language. And the man who thus answers, in the light and knowledge of to-day, with the Constitution before his eyes, and the sun of liberty and equality full in his face, makes such an exposure of his intelligence or his morals, or both, that he can not hope long to receive the countenance of those who love justice and obey the law.

To give this question an affirmative answer; to give effect to the guaranties of the Constitution; to make political equality more than a name; to lift from the Republic the reproach of making the elective franchise to a portion of our people "a word of promise to the ear, broken to the hope," is the purpose of this bill. An object worthier the pursuit of a free Government and an honest people, it would be difficult to suggest.

THE BALLOT IS SUPPRESSED.

That the freedom of the ballot is subjected not only to serious menace, but open assault in some sections of the Union, is not open to doubt. That justice is denied to many citizens and constitutional rights and privileges are hindered, obstructed, and in many instances totally destroyed, is an established fact of history; it is the subject of common observation and daily and hourly avowal by tongue and pen.

It is the common boast of the most distinguished and influential citizens—politicians, journalists, and statesmen—among the Democratic portion of the people of the South, that white political supremacy must and shall be maintained at any and all cost by whatever means, fair or foul, that may be necessary to that end. Distinguished Northern Democrats not imbued so deeply with antipathy to the constitutional guaranties on this subject have not only failed to disavow the extreme utterances of Southern statesmen, but have distinctly concurred in them.

In the Forty-second Congress, in an official report on the condition of the South, Senator Bayard joined with the minority of the committee in the distinct avowal that negro suffrage would practically cease when the Republican party should be defeated. These are the exact words of the report:

But whenever the Republican party shall go down, as go down it will at some time not long in the future, that will be the end of the political power of the negro among white men on this continent.

I cite this to illustrate the character of the threats constantly made by men who allowed their hatred of the colored man to lead them to wanton lawlessness in overriding the Constitution and depriving their fellow-citizens of their constitutional rights. In other words, in contravention of right, in derogation of our boasted principles of political equality, in disregard of common justice and defiance of all constitutional guaranties, whenever and wherever the political ascendancy of white Democrats requires it, the right of the colored citizen to a free ballot shall be trampled under foot, the law disobeyed, the Constitution annulled, and the majesty and power of the Republic defied.

Before the overwhelming cloud of witnesses who have borne reluctant testimony to the facts which illustrate the condition I have described; before the harrowing details of wrong which blot the fair escutcheon of our country, the shameless deeds of wanton cruelty to drive humble and defenseless citizens from their rights, which furnish confirmation strong as proofs of holy writ, I stand appalled. I shrink from a recital of the horrible story and gladly forego a task so repulsive. The instances present a singular and interesting variety of means, covering the entire scale from savage cruelty to the most ingenious and refined devices to terrorize, hoodwink, and deceive for purposes of political spoliation.

DUTY OF REPUBLICANS.

In view, then, of existing political conditions in a portion of the Union, the protection of the ballot is brought into distinct prominence, and is pressing with extreme urgency upon the attention of the country at this time. To no part of its creed is the Republican party more irrevocably committed than to this noble and necessary doctrine.

We believe that in forms of government in which sovereignty resides in the people and speaks through popular elections a free ballot and a fair count are the very breath of the nation's life. As Grattan said of the Irish parliament, "It is our very being; nay, more, it is our life to come." We believe that whatever hinders the free expression of the sovereign will at the ballot-box gags the nation while highwaymen rob it of its liberty.

We believe that no darker reproach ever rested upon the fair escutcheon of the Republic than that which now drapes it with forbidding black; that men are suffered to climb to power and to maintain political supremacy upon the ruins of the constitutional right of American citizens to a free ballot and a fair count; and that, too, with the mightiest Republic on earth standing by consenting. We can not witness with composure the paradox the nation presents. Contemplate it for a moment. We protect the American citizen in every land but our own, everywhere but at home. Let any Government on earth commit an outrage upon one of our citizens and a million swords would leap from their scabbards if necessary, and the naval armament of the nation would plow the seas with guns shot to the muzzle to avenge the wrong.

Martin Koszta, a native of Hungary, who was not a full naturalized citizen, though he had in due form of law made his declaration to become so, while in Smyrna was seized by command of the Austrian consul-general and placed on board the Humar, an Austrian vessel, where he was held in confinement. Captain Ingraham, in command of the American sloop-of-war St. Louis, arriving in port at that critical moment and ascertaining that Kosta had with him his naturalization papers, demanded his release, and enforced his demand by training his guns on the Austrian vessel. The words of his dispatch to his home Government were:

I weighed my anchor; I drew to within half a cable's length of the Austrian brig-of-war. Near her were a ten-gun schooner and two armed merchantmen ready to assist her. I ran up the American flag, shot my guns, and demanded this poor fellow, who had no more American citizenship than the filing of his intention to become one, and he was surrendered.

This is the way we protect our citizens abroad; and Congress voted a gold medal to Commander Ingraham for his resolute and heroic achievement.

Yet we tranquilly witness the rights of our citizens at home, under our own flag, slaughtered in cold blood, with malice aforethought, with deliberate and predetermined intent, by their fellow-citizens, and lift not a hand to spare or save.

LULLED TO REPOSE.

We listen to the silver tongues of Southern orators and applaud their soft and subduing eloquence, that lulls us to repose with the delusive idea that their hearts are going out in infinite tenderness to their dark-skinned brother; that what they withhold from him is for his good and theirs; that with benign purpose and fraternal motive they are shielding him from the full blast of the sun of liberty until his eyes grow strong enough to open undazzled upon the midday beam; that he is happy and jubilant in the peaceful fields, and contentment runs with the singing plow; and that, at any rate, they can settle their controversy with him without the intervention of mediators. Graphically presented, the situation is this: A bully knocks down a defenseless man and places his foot on his prostrate neck. When the officer of the law interposes, he is told by the man who commands the situation to keep hands off; that the parties concerned understand their difficulties and can settle them to their mutual satisfaction without assistance, and the peace officer walks away satisfied.

THE NATION'S SHAME.

Thus is the nation behaving while the blood of its murdered citizens cries from the ground and the walls of the persecuted and terror-stricken are borne on the four winds of heaven to the deaf ears of a country they helped to save and in whose service they bore themselves with such conspicuous valor that no white soldier of the Union who witnessed their heroic daring, as they charged into the open mouths of frowning batteries or climbed the blood-crested waves of the battle, but would have said with Henry, at Agincourt, what good faith and national honor imperiously demand that we say now as to their political rights:

He, to-day, that sheds his blood with me
Shall be my brother.

THE COLORED MAN.

Can we forget that it was in the darkest hour of the night of our trial, when the great fact loomed "huge and hideous" that we must lose the Union or grant the freedom of the slave, that we called upon the black man to help us, and amidst the thunder and lightning of battle, more terrible than that on Sinai's burning summit, we made our covenant with him, sealed with his blood and ours and witnessed by heaven, that when the war was over and the nation saved he should enter into the enjoyment of the blessings and glories of citizenship? How are we fulfilling our covenant?

REVENGE.

We believe that among the people of a portion of the Union there exist a strange deformity of character, an obliquity of moral vision, a spirit of brutality, an inveterate prejudice, a pitiless despotism, which find graphic portrayal in the cruel persecutions and merciless prescriptions practiced upon defenseless citizens to drive them by the terror of fear to the abdication of their rights as freemen and the relinquishment of the fruits of their enfranchisement.

We believe that no republic can consent to this and live; that no people can long inflict this wrong upon their neighbors without themselves in turn losing the rights they wrest from others. There is no escape from the avenging Nemesis. The furies will pursue and finally overtake them. No human power can avert it. The great King Og, in the Jewish story, lifted a great rock to hurl at his enemies, but God made a hole in the middle of it, so that it slipped down upon the giant's neck, where it remained forever. Will not our deluded countrymen pause, reflect, and consider whether the rock they lift to crush the rights of others may not some day, in the changeless round of justice, encircle their own necks?

CONFESSION AND AVOIDANCE.

Their plea to a portion of the indictment against them, touching their cruelty to the colored people, is "not guilty;" but, to the distinct accusation that they deny to their colored neighbors their political rights, refuse to allow the honest results of elections to be declared, but suppress enough votes to make those results conform to their wishes, their plea is one of "confession and avoidance;" that true it is that we annul the Constitution, defy the organic law, and put our feet on the necks of our neighbors; but we are justified in doing so in order to maintain white political supremacy; that is to say, the violation of the Constitution is justified on grounds of political necessity, a necessity for one class of citizens to maintain its ascendancy over another class against its will and in violation of its right.

POLITICAL CONSEQUENCES.

The political consequences of the wrongs which they seek thus to justify may be seen by their influence upon the vote as shown in the subjoined tabulated statement, which is itself a most convincing argument in support of the proposition to call in national supervision to secure a free expression of the will of the people at national elections. The table shows how Democratic methods have increased the Democratic and diminished the Republican vote in five States:

States.	Republican vote, 1870-1876.	Republican vote, 1886.

In the same five States the Congressional vote in 1886 was as follows:

State.	Democratic.	Republican.	Congressmen elected.
Alabama.....	51,592	21,916	8 Democrats.
Georgia.....	25,470	1,860	10 Democrats.
Louisiana.....	63,097	20,966	6 Democrats.

South Carolina.....	38,614	85	7 Democrats.
Total vote.....	214,534	52,027	38 Democrats.

In the same five States the Congressional vote in 1888 was as follows:

State.	Democratic.	Republican.	Congressmen elected.
			Dem.	Rep.
Alabama.....	117,583	54,351	8
Georgia.....	90,046	33,476	10
Louisiana.....	86,432	26,827	5 1

South Carolina.....	63,915	10,031	7
Total.....	444,790	150,285	37 1

Every district in these five States, with one exception, was returned as electing a Democratic Congressman. It thus appears that in 1888 (it was much worse in 1886) a total vote of 595,075 in five Southern States elected thirty-eight members of the House, while in the States of New York and Connecticut it required 1,470,873 votes to elect the same number. The atrocity of this outrage upon the ballot will appear in a still more vivid light when it is remembered that the enfranchisement of the colored race brought to the Electoral College in the South an acquisition of thirty-eight votes, which the Democracy have appropriated to swell their Congressional representation, while the colored Republicans in most sections remain unrepresented. These results plead trumpet-tongued against the deep damnation of such a system of political spoliation and—

Heaven's cherubim, horsed
Upon the sightless couriers of the air,
Should blow the horrid deeds in every eye—until the nation ends them.

LEGAL OBLIGATION.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that no political considerations can ever be permitted to dispute a moral or a legal obligation. The Constitutional rights of citizens rest upon the highest possible sanction, and are not to be set aside by any alleged rights of inferior obligation. The claims of justice are superior to those of political expediency. No man has ever permanently succeeded by denying to others the rights he claims himself. No nation has ever become great by dispensing with justice. The Almighty would not allow such an experiment to succeed. Any individual who seriously insists upon such a proposition demonstrates either his lack of sincerity or his insensibility to moral distinctions. Those who insist that it is wrong to protect by law the rights of citizens against the incursions of wrongdoers and in the same breath hold it right to despoil their neighbors of their rights and leave them naked and helpless to the mercy of their enemies, can not reasonably hope to receive credit for both good faith and good judgment.

MORAL ATROPHY.

The total loss of moral vision betrayed by Watt K. Johnson, of South Carolina, who said, in the case of Hill vs. Catchings, that he would stuff a ballot-box in the interest of honest government, finds a parallel in the story of the Spanish silversmith, told by Macaulay in one of his parliamentary speeches. The silversmith was a pious man, always telling his beads, attending mass and observing the feasts and fasts of the church. One day while he was admonishing his servant how monstrous it was to do a wrong, especially in relation to sacred things, sacrilege being, he said, a sin of the greatest horror, an ill-looking fellow came into the shop with some church plate and a silver crucifix and asked the pious man to buy them. The latter exclaimed with holy horror that he would not buy them or touch them, as he knew what they were, and denounced the wretch in unmeasured terms for his wickedness.

"Then," said the thief, "if you will not buy them, will you melt them down for me?" "Melt them down?" said the pious silversmith, "that is quite another matter." He took the chalices and crucifix with a pair of tongs, dropped them into the crucible, melted them, and delivered the bullion to the thief and received his five pistoles in payment, and the thief decamped. The young servant stared at the transaction, while his master gravely resumed, "My son, take warning by that sacrilegious knave and take example by me. Think what a load of guilt lies on his conscience. But, as to me, you saw I would not touch the stolen goods. And thus I thrive in fear of God and manage to turn an honest penny."

EXTENUATING CIRCUMSTANCES.

This phenomenal obtuseness of morals evinced by a portion of our people may derive some palliation from circumstances over which the present generation had no control, and to that extent they may be entitled to our commiseration, but not to our complicity in the wrong they propose.

Men will have the defects of their qualities, and the latter are the product of time and environment. "Man is explicable by nothing less than all his history," said the wise Emerson. The principles inlaid in the character of a people by two hundred years of the culture of habit, thought, and education can not be eradicated in a single generation. It is an immutable law that decay of faculty will follow disuse of function. A people who shut their eyes to justice for two hundred years can not regain their vision in one generation.

The conditions imposed by the institution of slavery caused the character of the superior race to undergo modifications which greatly enfeebled their moral faculties, blunted their moral sense, and made cruelty and oppression and denial of right to others seem to them quite compatible with good moral conduct. The moral insensibility which made it possible for them to buy, sell, task, and whip human beings before the war made it easy for them after the war to countenance the burning of the houses of negroes, butchering them in their beds, or hanging them on the nearest tree. The inhumanity that enabled them before the war to believe that an institution which dispensed with the domestic relations, abolished the holy words home, family, wife, child, father, mother, brother, and sister, and withheld legal sanction and moral obligation from the relations which these words imply was of divine sanction, was quite equal to the task after the war of instituting a system of merciless proscription, which spared neither age nor sex, to terrorize the negro and rob him of his ballot.

The same moral atrophy which qualified the clergy of the Confederate States of America in 1863 to issue an address to the Christians throughout the world, in which they declared:

We testify in the sight of God that the relation of master and slave among us is not incompatible with our holy christianity; and the presence of the Africans of our land is an occasion of gratitude on their behalf before God.

The practicable plan for benefiting the African race must be the providential plan, the scriptural plan. We adopt that plan in the South.

made the congress of the Confederacy in 1865 capable of passing the bill known as the negro soldiers' bill.

I quote the first and last sections:

A bill to increase the military force of the Confederate States.

1. The congress of the Confederate States of America do enact that, in order to provide additional forces to repel invasion, maintain the rightful possession of the Confederate States, secure their independence, and preserve their institutions, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to ask for and accept from the owners of slaves the services of such number of able-bodied negro men as he may deem expedient, for and during the war, to perform military service in whatever capacity he may direct.

5. That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize a change in the relation of the said slaves.

DIABOLISM.

What! Ask a man to fight for your liberty; to gather into his breast the daggers aimed at your country's heart; to carry his own life in his hand into the imminent deadly breach, that your flag might float and reward him with chains and slavery! Great God! Is there any depth of inhumanity beneath this deep? Is this not the incarnation of diabolism? Yet the act was passed and approved by Jefferson Davis. I never heard of but one protest against it. To the credit of the human race it may be said that this rayless night of insensibility to the claims of gratitude which seem to shroud this people was penetrated by one beam of humanity from the heart of General R. E. Lee, who, writing to a Confederate congressman, acquiescing in the proposition to arm the negroes, added:

I think those who are employed should be freed. It would be neither just nor wise, in my opinion, to require them to remain as slaves.

Their ineradicable conviction before the war that the subject race had no rights which they were bound to respect made it easy for them after the war to believe that the reconstruction policy, which elevated that race to an equality, civilly and politically, with their former masters, was a blow at them in mere wantonness of power, for the purpose of revenge, and in pursuance of that belief to openly denounce that policy as unconstitutional and void and to resist it to the very brink of treason. And it is, therefore, in some degree natural, and may be entitled to that patience due the infirmities of human nature, that our white brethren in the South regard our insistence upon the enforcement of the constitutional guaranties of every citizen of the Republic, white or black, strong or weak, as inspired by vindictive rather than just motives and for salutary ends. These views may cause us to look with compassionate tenderness upon the needless distress of their minds, but they can not and ought not to weaken the firmness of our attachment to justice or slacken our determination to secure to every voting citizen under the flag a free ballot and a fair count.

These considerations, Mr. Speaker, sufficiently indicate the necessity of some legislation to improve existing conditions and remedy existing evils. It is not merely a privilege extended which we may enjoy or not. It is a duty imposed which we must perform. The Constitution commands it, justice requires it, humanity and gratitude plead for it trumpet-tongued.

INGRATITUDE.

Speaking of gratitude, I can not repress the thought, how insensible to the obligations of this noble virtue are our white brethren of the South. That the colored people exhibited toward their masters, during the dark days of the war, a devotion and fidelity as steadfast as they were beautiful, has been shown by too great a volume of testimony to be in doubt. Southern statesmen themselves are truthful and voluntary witnesses on this point. Senator VANCE, of North Carolina, says:

The negro race that was born and reared among us did not rise up to do us harm in the hour of our extremest adversity, even for the great boon of freedom and amidst the most tempting incitements, but continued faithful to their masters and their families, even within hearing of the guns that were roaring to set them free.

Senator BUTLER, of South Carolina, says:

Nor do I underestimate the obligation we are all under to this race for their fidelity and most praiseworthy conduct during our depleting civil strife. Whatever fate the future may have in store for him, nothing can destroy or obliterate the strong ties of affectionate kindness between himself and his former master.

Henry W. Grady, of Georgia, in his New York speech in 1886, said:

We remember with what fidelity for four years he guarded our defenseless women and children, whose husbands and fathers were fighting against his freedom. To his eternal credit be it said that whenever he struck a blow for his own liberty he fought in open battle, and when at last he raised his black and humble hands that the shackles might be struck off, those hands were innocent of wrong against his helpless charges and worthy to be taken in loving grasp by every man who honors loyalty and devotion.

General Gordon, in his Chicago speech last November, said:

During the war, gray-bearded sires, frail women and children were left upon the great plantations, and in a large measure in charge of the entire colored population. The conquering legions of the Union with emancipation emblazoned on their banners moved in their very midst. The cannon of the victorious army thundered day and night in the black man's ear the news of his freedom, and its flashing bayonets formed around him a cordon of protection if he would but abandon his home and strike a blow for his own freedom. Yet in all that broad land not one single arm, with the exception of the few who had joined the Federal Army, was raised against helpless woman save to protect her.

And now, with all the provocation they endure, the temperate tone of the representative men of the race is a notable circumstance. No cry for vengeance mingles with their indignant protest against the wrongs they suffer. They rise to the height of the great argument of civilization, and appeal to law, and not to violence.

The Charleston News-Courier, commenting on the Barnwell massacre, brings into such distinct view the good behavior of the race under the most trying circumstances that I beg to add a paragraph:

The colored people throughout the State have been terribly shocked by the massacre in Barnwell on Friday last; but, so far as we are informed, have behaved with singularly good judgment under very distressing circumstances. They look to the regular constituted methods of the law for the proper punishment of the Barnwell crime, and are to be commended for their pacific disposition. An address signed by about two hundred colored men of Charleston and vicinity, has been sent to many of the leading representatives of the race throughout the State requesting them to meet in Columbia, on Thursday evening next, "for the purpose of consulting and formulating a plan by which the law can be enforced and order preserved through the proper officers of the State."

The address of the colored men is not the voice of vengeance or an appeal to the base passions of an ignorant and irresponsible mob, but is rather distinguished for its conservatism of language and for its deference to law. It is a prayer for protection to no outside authority, but to the proper officers of the State government. It is a special plea for the good offices of the Democratic officials of South Carolina, and not for the interposition of the Federal authority. It is a pledge of the negro's confidence in the strength and honesty of the State government and of his willingness to assist in "upholding the strong arm of the administration." In a word, the signers of the address throw themselves upon the protection of the governor of the State. Whatever difference of opinion there may be as to the wisdom or necessity of the proposed conference, we are sure that Governor Richardson will extend to the committee to be appointed by the conference the kindest consideration and will approve of any practicable plan for the suppression of violence and the overthrow of mob law.

Under such circumstances it ought not to require a very keen sense of services rendered and obligations due to impel the debtors to make some returns for past favors in the way of just treatment and a cordial recognition of rights earned by their services and good behavior, and awarded by the Government to which they were never disloyal.

RIGHT AND DUTY OF SUPERVISION.

In all ages and all nations where popular governments have been in vogue there have been frauds, wrongs, violence, and intimidation which made it necessary to enact laws for their suppression and to protect the voter in the exercise of his rights. The elective franchise has been the subject of legal protection wherever and whenever it has been exercised. The statute-books of every nation on the face of the globe where the citizens vote contain statutes designed to prevent wrongs which impede, obstruct, or prevent the free exercise of that "expression" of a freeman's will. It is so in every State in this Union, and by no other means can the purity of the ballot be maintained.

The first clause of the fourth section of the first article of the Constitution is in these words:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Representatives and Senators shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to places of choosing Senators.

The reason for this provision is made clear by Alexander Hamilton in his article on the "Regulation of elections" in The Federalist. He says:

I am greatly mistaken if there be any article in the whole plan more completely defensible than this. Its propriety rests upon the evidence of this plain proposition, that every government ought to contain in itself the means of its own preservation.

Nothing can be more evident than that an exclusive power of regulating elections for the National Government in the hands of the State Legislatures would leave the existence entirely at their mercy. They could at any moment entirely annihilate it by neglecting to provide for the choice of persons to administer its affairs. . . . If we are in a humor to presume the abuses of power it is as fair to presume them on the part of the State governments as on the part of the General Government. And as it is more consonant to the rules of a just theory to intrust the Union with the care of its own existence than to transfer that care to any other hands; if abuses of power are to be hazarded on the one side or on the other it is more rational to hazard them where the power would naturally be placed than where it would unnaturally be placed.

Under the prevailing construction of this provision of the Constitution, the United States is held to adopt the regulations prescribed by the States for the conduct of their elections, as the regulations for elections for Representatives in Congress; but, when necessary to give effect to the guaranties of the Constitution and prevent the disfranchisement of voters or accomplish the effective operation of the necessary agencies of government, Congress may make new regulations or modify those already prescribed by the States to any extent necessary to the full protection of the voter and the complete defense of the existence of the Government.

It may be observed in passing that the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution guaranties to citizens immunity from discriminations in the elective franchise on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, and empowers Congress to enforce the right by appropriate legislation. The right to vote comes from the State, but the right of exemption from the prohibited discrimination comes from the United States, and hence the power of Congress to supervise elections when Congressmen are to be chosen, when necessary to prevent the forbidden acts of discrimination.

The limits of State and Federal power, respectively, in relation to elections, are clearly defined in Ex parte Siebold, 100 United States, 391. The ground of the distinction and of the necessity for holding the Federal power paramount is set forth in Ex parte Yarborough, 110 United States, 651, in these words:

It is as essential to the successful working of this Government that the great organism of its executive and legislative branches should be the free choice of the people as that the original form of it should be so. In a republican Government like ours where political power is reposed in representatives of the entire body of the people chosen at short intervals by popular elections, the temptation to control these elections by violence and corruption is a constant source of danger. Such has been the history of all republics, and though ours has been comparatively free from both these evils in the past, no lover of his country can shut his eyes to the fear of the future danger from both sources.

The extent of the power has no limit within the sanctions of the Constitution, if necessary to protect the citizen in the enjoyment of his constitutional privileges and the performance of his constitutional duties. No power is too great to employ in the accomplishment of a result of such transcendent importance, and the limit can only be measured by the necessity that calls the power into requisition.

THE SOUTH AVERSE TO JUSTICE.

To discuss the provisions of the bill in detail, to show how appropriate they are to the end proposed and how effective they will be, would be a work of supererogation. We are not invited to such a task. The anticipated effectiveness of the bill is the chief objection to it.

The quarrel of the other side is with any bill at all, least it may curtail prerogatives now enjoyed at the expense of others' rights. If they were willing to acquiesce in any legislation that would promote justice to their fellow-citizens we might discuss with them the comparative effectiveness of different schemes having that end in view. But every man knows that our friends across the aisle are not striving for justice to the negroes. Whatever pretensions they make, whatever commands they may have brought from their masters, that was not one of them, or if it was it has been erased from the table.

A sanctimonious pilot took to sea with him the Ten Commandments, but he scraped out one of them, "Thou shalt not steal," because, he said, "That commandment commanded him from his functions." He went out to steal. Similarly I think the commandment to do justice to the colored man in the South would command the Democracy from their functions. They set out to do him injustice.

ENFORCEMENT OF THE LAW.

I am for the bill on the distinct ground that it is a constitutional and necessary measure, made necessary by those who fear its operation and justified by the conditions created by those who oppose its passage. And when passed I am for its enforcement, North and South, if need be, with a firmness and effectiveness that may remind wrongdoers of the manner in which Aaron Burr is said to have presided at the impeachment of Judge Chase, "With the vigor of a devil, but with the impartiality of a saint."

POWER OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Of the power and the duty of the Government in the premises I have no doubt. I will not believe that this Republic, born in the cradle of liberty, baptized in the blood of patriots and dedicated to justice, clothed with majesty, dominion, and power, is unable to protect its citizens from political piracy. I can not believe that a nation which loosens the purse-strings of every citizen who sells a pint of whisky or a box of cigars and handcuffs every thief who steals a letter from a mail-box within the limits of its extended dominion can not prevent or punish the crime of suppressing the votes of any portion of its citizens. Who says to the contrary utters moral treason; who believes it, must carry in his own breast the corpse of his respect for his country.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in Cunningham vs. Nealey, say:

The National Government must execute its powers or it is no government. It must execute them on land as well as on the sea. To do this it must necessarily have power to command obedience, preserve order, and keep the peace, and no person in the land has a right to resist or question its authority so long as it keeps within the bounds of its jurisdiction.

In Martin vs. Hunter, the same tribunal say:

The General Government must cease to exist whenever it loses the power to protect itself in the exercise of its Constitutional powers.

Behind the Constitution are the Army and the Navy. Every sword, every bayonet, every cannon, and every dollar of the nation's wealth are pledged to the enforcement of every one of its provisions. When the time shall come that the nation acquiesces in the proposition that the power of the Government is unequal to the task of upholding, sustaining, and enforcing every command of the Constitution, that moment the sand in the hour-glass of our history as a nation will begin to run.

REMEDIES.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there being a remedy ought it not to be applied? The disease is a loathsome one, but it will yield to treatment. If neglected too long, however, it may require the last resources of surgery to save the patient's life. To adopt the suggestion of Southern statesmen and let it alone, depending upon the recuperative power of the patient to throw off the distemper, would leave the colored voters in a situation aptly described in the nursery rhyme:

There was an old man who said, how Shall I flee from this horrible cow?
I will sit on the stile,
And continue to smile,
Which may soften the heart of this cow.

Their insistence on this mode of not correcting the difficulty denotes a deliberate purpose to perpetuate the wrong, in which the nation can not acquiesce. We would say to the white race, first take your foot from the prostrate neck of your neighbor and give him a hand to help him up. They may think that would result in vexatious annoyance and would wrong their self-love, but it would be neither so grievous nor so enduring as they suppose, and education would cure it all. They know what infinite gain came to them and to the honor of their country when they reluctantly called in their blood-hounds and let loose their schoolmasters. Now, will they not take another advance step; hang up their shotguns, sheathe their knives, quench their midnight torches, and try in their stead personal security, safety of property, unviolated homes, and a free ballot for their colored brethren, and see what miracles will result? They probably, in their blindness, see too small an arc to be able, even in imagination, to conceive the immeasurable circle of relief this broad policy of benevolence, justice, and humanity would bring them.

WHITE SUPREMACY.

The distinguished gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] said that the white man must either rule the South or leave it. That is a dilemma of their own choosing. No national exigency, no requirements of the Constitution or the law subject them to such an alternative. But, as a choice of evils, it would be better for the whole Hemphill family to leave the land that contains the bones of their fathers than that they continue to rule from their present seat upon the ruins of the Constitution.

LIONS IN THE FABLE.

Let me propound to the white sages of the South one question. Why can not the superior race exert a controlling influence over the inferior without the use of violence and fraud? It is the history of the human race that the superior nature leads the inferior. The weak yields to the dominion of the strong, and it is only otherwise where the strong having the strength of a giant uses it as a giant for purposes of oppression and wrong, which goad the weaker to resentment and self-defense. Our Southern brethren play the rôle of the lions in the fable. The hares and the rabbits once petitioned the lions for equality of suffrage. The lions told them they must wait until their teeth and claws were grown.

TEETH AND CLAWS.

Are the white people of the South cultivating teeth and claws in the docile colored race, and will they some day better the instruction and turn and rend their teachers? Oppressed races have sometimes risen and taken their future in their own hands. As their intelligence grows more, their docility may grow less. As they acquire means their disposition to submit may diminish. As their courage increases their servility may decrease. Every race will take and hold the rank its courage and capacity give it. I will not pursue the thought; it is too horrible.

I leave it with them for their serious and thoughtful consideration. If they knew what pirate crafts their hardness of heart and stiffness of neck may be rigging with curses dark to scourge the sea of their boasted Caucasian glory, could they see the glare of the internal fires their wrongs may be feeding to furnish the volcanic force for some future political overthrow in self-defense, could they scent the miasma which their lack of justice may be generating to swell the fury of some coming blast to test forever, perhaps in blood, the question of race supremacy, like recreant Romans they would fall upon their knees and pray the gods to avert the plagues that must light upon such folly, while they hastened to invoke, in the treatment of their fellows, the christian law, "Do unto others as ye would that others should do unto you."

DUTY OF SUPERIOR RACE.

The superior race ought to be wise in their day and generation. They ought to cultivate amiable relations with the inferior; they ought to be wise and dexterous in the control of the weak. They ought to be able to divide the inferior race with their intellectual blades, so that their political divisions would not follow lines of color cleavage. Their ability to do this is the true test of their title to political ascendancy. As long as they do not have both colors on the same side of political questions, it demonstrates anything else than their superiority in the use of the intellectual and moral agencies available to produce the results they desire.

Senator VANCE says:

There exist between the former owner and the present freedman many of those kindly and controlling relations which existed between master and slave. In addition to his ignorance and inexperience of affairs, the colored man still leans upon and looks to his former master for direction and advice.

With this vantage ground, with the conditions inviting his influence, why can not the superior control the dependent inferior sufficiently to maintain the supremacy of the former without a horsewhip, a shotgun, or a fraudulent device? Kind treatment, cordial relations, equal laws, and a friendly palm would work like a charm upon the susceptible minds and affectionate hearts of the colored race.

There are intelligent citizens in the South who hold these views. J. M. Gibson, district attorney of Shelby County, Tennessee, in the Memphis Daily Commercial, says:

"Mr. Editor, I am perhaps one among a very few who believe that intelligence can rule this country without resort to those tricks which are calculated in the end to undermine and destroy the moral consciences of our people. I believe there is a way to reform our elections and maintain good government, honestly and justly administered, otherwise than by recourse to questionable methods, either of fraud or violence. Let some expedient be tried which will not deny a poor or illiterate white man or negro a voice in our elections before harsher methods are proclaimed to be cruel necessities for the protection of virtue and the furtherance of prosperity."

PLATO'S PROPOSITIONS ARE SOUND.

There may be much truth and some philosophy in the following observations of Rev. Plato Johnson, a colored teacher in Georgia, on the subject of equal laws:

Now, my judgement is dat when de Souf comes to de 'clusion dat dere ain't no niggers in dis country, dat ebberbody is white 'fore de law, de race question will take to de woods. Long's dere's one law fer de whites an' annudder law fer de blacks we ain't goin' to hev no peace. But ef you can 'suaude de Souf to use de same hammer to brake de head of a white rascal as it uses to break de head ob a black scoundrel den you've got dis yere problem by de horns.

SUPPOSITIONS AND PROPHESIES.

"How impotent and imbecile the human mind appears when it attempts to forecast human events," said Senator BUTLER, of South Carolina, in his great speech on the emigration of the colored race. The sentiment is trite, but true enough, but the Senator's application was exceedingly unhappy. He proceeded to say:

Let me illustrate from our own experience: Suppose, in the year 1860, when the relation of master and slave existed in eleven of the States of this Union, some prophet had predicted that within ten years of that time the proud Caucasian master would be practicing his profession before a negro judge, addressing a negro jury, summoned by a negro sheriff, and attended by a negro bailiff, all lately negro slaves. He would have been thought to be on the verge of insanity. Or if some wiseacre had about that time foretold that the then despised slave would, within the same period, represent a sovereign slave State in the Senate of the United States or represent the United States in a diplomatic capacity in a foreign country, he would have incurred the ridicule and sibes everywhere as a deluded negrophiliist. And yet, Mr. President, we have lived to see all these things.

Let me suggest another illustration. Suppose in the year 1865, when Grant laid his conquering sword on the capitol of the Confederacy, accepted Lee's surrender at Appomattox, and the curtain fell upon the tragedy of the rebellion; when, by the greatest act of magnanimity in the history of war, the vanquished army of the rebellion was permitted to go to their homes on their parol of honor and to take their horses with them to cultivate their farms, some prophet had predicted that in the narrow space of twelve years every State government in the South would be surrendered to the men whose hands were so lately taken from the nation's throat and the loyal portion of the population turned over to the tender mercies of the ruling rebels, or if some wiseacre had about that time foretold that the Confederate brigadiers, who surrendered their swords to the Union generals and gave up as a bad job their undertaking to destroy the Government, would within a few swift fleeting years flash in the face of the nation the sword of political power in place of the sword of treason they had surrendered, and return to their seats in the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States as the accredited representatives of the once disloyal people of the seceded States, with the loyal friends of the Union counted in the bases of representation, but stripped of their rights, suppressed, and unrepresented—he would have incurred the ridicule of every right-minded man. And yet we have lived to see these extraordinary things.

Again he says:

Suppose another sage given to forecast the future should in 1870 or ten years later have foretold that within the next decade not one representative of the negro race would be occupying a seat in that same Senate or on the bench anywhere in this broad land, and that not one of this numerous race filled any, or, if any, a very insignificant position of honor or trust in any of the States of this Union. He, too, would have been written down an untrustworthy guide and philosopher, but he would have been a true prophet.

I beg to supply another supposition to complete the series. Suppose in 1890 another sage casting the horoscope of the future would foretell that at the end of the next decade not one of the representatives of the old Bourbon Confederate line of Southern politicians, who are now entrenched in power by reason of the patience and silence of a people suffering the deprivation of their constitutional rights, would be occupying a seat in this House, but that their seats would be filled by Republican representatives of a new, regenerated South, crowned at last on a throne of justice, in a robe of political equality, and with a diadem of loyalty to the Constitution and the country, some might write him down as a vain and foolish babbler, but I should say of such a one that he was endowed with true prophetic vision.

In 1866 Hon. Benj. H. Hill, of Georgia, declared:

There was a South of secession and slavery; that South is dead. There is a South of Union and freedom; that South is living, breathing, growing every hour.

The eloquent Georgian journalist made these words the text of his great speech twenty years later. They were no more nor no less true at the later than the earlier period. They were history merely; let me add to them prophecy. There will be a South, not only of Union and freedom, but of fraternity, christian forbearance, justice, and equality of right among all citizens. All hail the coming South!

NEED OF A LEADER.

To speed its coming I devoutly pray that another son may soon be born to that sunny land to bless his mother and lead her people; a later Grady who will exceed the earlier in the breadth and height of his conception of the constitutional rights of the citizens; a man of iron nerve and unflinching courage, who will not fear to be just; a man who shall bring, as a meet equipment for his commanding task, a mind touched with rare intellectual splendor, a soul kindled with a Promethean spark from Liberty's altar, and a heart yearning to robe every citizen in the royal purple of equal justice; who, moved to a noble rage by the spectacle of Republicanism in a portion of the Union crouching and trembling at the menace of violence, will lift up his great spirit and send his voice careering like a tornado across the land, declaring to the political brigands, in the fiery words of O'Connell, "that the thunderbolts of God are hot," and to their patient and long-suffering victims that the dawn of the day of their deliverance is at hand.

JUSTICE AND EDUCATION.

When our Democratic friends realize that there can not be, under the Constitution, a white oligarchy in States whose citizens are more than half colored; when they learn that there is a middle ground between marrying and murdering the colored people, whereon they can safely stand; when they are willing to try the totally new experiment of crucifying their prejudices and their jealousies, and make a sincere effort to treat their neighbors justly and fairly, doing unto others as they would that others should do to them; when these conditions ensue, the so-called race problem will be more than half solved.

There are alternative solutions of the question. One is in the hands of the people of the South and is as clear as light, and the way to it is as straight as a line. The other remains with the nation. The former may be expressed in two words, justice and education—justice by the white toward the black man and the education of both.

The education of the colored people is an indispensable factor in any solution of the problem. Their minds must be informed, their morals improved, and their manners refined. The colored voter is a sovereign whose political dominion is co-extensive with that of his white neighbor. Both must be qualified for their kingdom. All must alike be molded on forms of virtue, self-restraint, obedience, and loyalty to conscience and country.

They must be self-governing in that wide range of activities and relations that lie outside the sanctions of the statute and far to the right and left of the constable's beat. When thus qualified the two races will dwell together in amity, unity, and harmony in their relations under the Constitution and the law, and outside of these will enjoy the individuality, the diversity of tastes and employments, the social relations, and intellectual diversions which their self-imposed conditions require, and there will be no race problem.

The London Spectator comes near the nerve of the case in the following observations on the race problem in the South:

It is possible that, if both are willing, two peoples in two states of civilization can live side by side and benefit each other. They do so when not separated by color, for that was the actual position for centuries all over Europe of employers and employed, of those with a little culture and capital and those with neither. The white man's inheritance of civilization, not to speak of his inherent energy, will keep him at the top easily enough; and the labor to be done will divide itself naturally, the negro with his climatic aptitude being the cultivator, the white man, with his superior brain, the artisan. That solution, however, demands good-will and endless forbearance, and it is the absence of this good-will, the non-development of this forbearance, which makes the question of race prejudice so all-important to America.

DUTY OF THE GOVERNMENT IN THE INTERIM.

But, Mr. Speaker, while these higher conditions of society are being slowly evolved out of the chaos and disorder of the present, while the moral sense and reason of men are recovering their dominion, it is the duty of the Government to make it safe for every citizen to enjoy his constitutional privileges and perform his constitutional duties anywhere, at any time, in any proper way, and Congress will be recreant to its duty until it exhausts every constitutional agency to guaranty that safety.

Every uplifted arm to put the citizen in fear, to prevent his free use of the ballot, to express his will should be staid by the majesty of the nation or paralyzed by its power. The humblest and feeblest citizen under the flag, whatever his color or condition, who seeks an opportunity to register his sovereign will, must find as easy access to the ballot-box as the strongest and the greatest. Along that way the nation must stand guard; over that box must stand cherubim with flaming swords, that no terror shall overawe the citizen, no violence wrest from him his right to record his will, nor fraud falsify that record.

NO ROOM FOR PARTISAN POLITICS.

On a proposition to rescue the power of the Government from contempt and protect the people's rights from spoliation and outrage there ought to be no room for partisan politics. Such a field ought to be exclusively occupied by patriotism. An object so desirable and necessary should not cause dissension, but promote agreement; should not excite antagonism, but invite harmony; should not be a sword of division, but a bond of union.

In the great struggle to rescue the tomb of the Savior from the desecration of the Turk the great captains of the crusading armies, realizing that they were joint supporters of a more glorious banner than ever blazed before an earthly prince, resolved that the only strife between the lions of England and the lilies of France should be which should be carried farthest into the ranks of the infidels.

Can we not emulate this noble spirit? And as we unite in venerating the ballot, which voices the intelligent choice and honest conviction of the voter, as the most sacred object that ever touches a freeman's hand; as we unite in believing with Sumner that it is better than the soldier, stronger than the plunderer, wiser than the false prophets, more merciful than the despot, at once the good Samaritan to the poor, the physician to the sick, and the schoolmaster to the ignorant, can we not also unite in the defense of its purity and freedom and resolve that the only strife between us shall be which shall carry the glorious banner furthest into the despoilers' ranks?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] is recognized for ten minutes.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, the speech just delivered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROSIUS] is characteristic of the utterances which have fallen from that side of the Chamber during the course of this debate and, I may add, of those who controlled our State, county, and municipal governments during the reconstruction period.

Coming down amongst us in 1865 and greedily and violently taking possession of every office out of which anything was to be made, they were loud in proclaiming the superior civilization, refinement, intelligence, and wealth of the section whence they came, and at the very same time they were busily engaged in oppressing the people, in increasing taxation, and in putting everything upon which they could lay their hands into their own pockets.

The South—though then poor indeed—was a very El Dorado to those pioneers of civilization and representatives of the Republican party. Never before had such an opportunity been presented them for public and private plunder, and they made the most of it. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] When our local governments were thus overthrown and these strangers to our people were put in authority over us, Texas was out of debt and had a small surplus in the treasury. Her State tax was about 15 cents on the $100 and the county tax was one-half as much.

Before they were driven from power through the votes of an outraged people the rate of taxation, State and county together, had been advanced to nearly $4 on the hundred and an indebtedness fastened upon the State of more than six millions, to say nothing of the extent to which our counties, cities, and towns had become involved through their wasteful and corrupt extravagance. Salaries were largely swollen, jobs created and put through, offices multiplied, martial law declared in several counties, attended with arbitrary arrests of unoffending citizens and with the illegal seizure and deprivation of their property.

And to make it the more difficult to oust them from power but one polling-box was permitted in a county, and elections could only be held in the midst of a Republican police standing with arms in their hands around the voting places. It is probably well to remark that the area of the counties in Texas will average fully 900 square miles. Such, in brief, was the result of Republican misrule in Texas during the dark days of reconstruction, and her people do not want and will not have any more of it.

But, sir, when I arose it was to speak to the pending measure and not for the purpose of replying to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROSIUS] and following him upon the line of the remarks which he has chosen to make. I feel that it will be more profitable to confine myself to the question immediately under consideration. But, before doing so, permit me, Mr. Speaker, to remind gentlemen present that from the date of her admission into the Union, December 29, 1845, until now, there has been but one contest in this House as to the legality or rightfulness of the title of any of her Representatives to their seats upon this floor. One contest, and only one, has ever occurred, and that was during the Forty-second Congress.

A Republican governor, in utter and willful disregard of the law and of the facts of the case, gave to the Republican candidate the certificate of election. But, sir, to the credit of the Republican majority in this House at that time, be it said, the contestee, a Republican, was, upon the unanimous report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, a majority of whom were Republicans, deprived by the unanimous vote of this House of the seat which he had unjustly and illegally acquired, and the contestant, a Democrat, was admitted in his stead.

With this record, excelled by that of no other State in the Union, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that there has never been and is not now the slightest necessity for Federal interposition in the matter of Congressional elections in the State which I have the honor to represent in part upon this floor.

But the law is general in its character and may be enforced throughout the entire country. With an area of almost 175,000 square miles, in which there were at the election of 1888 about 3,935 voting precincts, with the absolute certainty of an early, large, and continuing increase of this number because of the heavy population which is now pouring into our unorganized and sparsely settled counties, it will be readily seen that this bill, if enacted into law and enforced in our State, will not only entail an enormous expenditure of money, but its execution in all of its details will be fruitful of oppression, of fraud, of corruption, and of violence. And this I will now endeavor to demonstrate, not by extended argument—for the time allotted me will not permit—but by a mere presentation of the skeleton or framework of the bill. The measure, Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, provides—

First. For the appointment of a chief supervisor in each judicial district in the United States by the circuit judge within whose jurisdiction such district or districts may be comprised; and his duty, when so appointed, shall be to supervise elections within the limits of his judicial district, at which Representatives or Delegates in Congress are voted for; to enforce the national election laws; and to prevent frauds and irregularities in naturalization and registration.

For these purposes he is invested with powers of the amplest character, and when appointed he may continue in office so long as he is faithful and capable.

Second. For the enforcement of the law in any Congressional district in which there is no city or town of 20,000 inhabitants, there must be an application or applications to the chief supervisor from not less than one hundred persons, who are citizens of the United States and residents and qualified voters in such district; and in cities or towns having 20,000 inhabitants or upwards the law may be enforced upon the application of not less than one hundred inhabitants of such city or town, they being qualified voters therein and citizens of the United States; and in any one or more counties or parishes in any Congressional district, and which form a part only of such Congressional district, the law may be put in operation upon the application or applications of not less than fifty persons, claiming to be citizens of the United States and residents and qualified voters in one or more of such counties or parishes.

Third. The enforcement of the law having been thus demanded, the chief supervisor shall submit to the circuit court the names of such persons as he may believe sufficient for filling all the election districts or voting precincts within his jurisdiction, and within the territory in which the law is to be enforced, and for supplying all vacancies which may arise or be created. The list of persons whose names are so submitted shall contain not less than double the whole number of supervisors which such city or town, county or parish, or entire Congressional district, as the case may be, is entitled to the services of; and these persons shall be appointed by the court. From the appointments so made, the chief supervisor shall, from time to time, select for duty and shall designate and assign, for each election district or voting precinct in any such city or town, county or parish, or entire Congressional district as they shall have been appointed for, three persons, but two of whom shall be of the same political party.

These persons so appointed are called supervisors of the election, and their appointment may be at any time revoked or renewed by the circuit court. The chief supervisor may at any time transfer any supervisor in one election district or voting precinct to another in the same city or town, or in the same county or parish, or in the same Congressional district; and he may also, for causes specified in the law, relieve and suspend from duty any supervisor of the election, and may detail and assign to his place another unassigned appointee of the court.

Any male citizen of the United States, of good character, a resident and qualified voter in the city or town, county or parish, or in the Congressional district in which shall be situated the place in which he is to discharge his duties, and can read and write the English language, shall be eligible for appointment as supervisor.

Fourth. Special deputy marshals, the number of which is to be determined, from time to time, at conferences between the marshal and chief supervisor, may be appointed by the marshal, one-third of whom shall be taken from such lists of persons as shall be forwarded the marshal by the chief supervisor. Among the duties of these deputy marshals will be the observance of the manner in which the election officers are enforcing the election laws of the United States, and preventing frauds and irregularities in naturalization and registration, and the taking charge of the canvass of the votes found in any box and to deliver the returns to the chief supervisor, when required to do so under the law. The only qualification which is prescribed for such deputy marshals is that they be able to read and write the English language.

Fifth. For the appointment by the circuit judge for each State within his judicial circuit a board of canvassers, to consist of three persons, citizens and residents of the State for which they shall be appointed and of good standing and repute, not more than two of whom shall belong to the same political party. They are to hold their office so long as they may be faithful and capable. The board shall have a seal and a clerk, and may convene at any place in the State where a term of the circuit court is regularly held. It will receive the reports, statements, returns, and certificates of the chief supervisor of the State and is invested with the power to inquire into them. Having determined who has been elected, the board will prepare the declaration and certificate for each Congressional district in triplicate, one of which shall be filed in the office of the chief supervisor for the district to which the declaration and certificate pertains; another shall be forwarded to the person found by the board to be elected; and the third copy shall be issued to the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States at Washington.

Sixth. It is made the duty of the Clerk to place the name of the person certified by the board as elected upon the rolls of persons elected as Representatives or Delegates in Congress, and upon conviction of a neglect, failure, or refusal to do so such Clerk shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, or by imprisonment for not less than one nor more than five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, and shall be forever disqualified from holding thereafter any office of trust or profit under the Government of the United States.

Seventh. To pay the chief supervisors, the supervisors of election, the special deputy marshals, and the boards of canvassers and their clerks, and for all other expenditures which are allowed, the bill makes a permanent and indefinite appropriation; requires the accounting officers of the Treasury to treat all accounts covering and providing for such payments as special; and forbids inquiry into them save only to correct errors found in figures or footings. This provision absolutely deprives Congress of any supervision over such expenditures, and should the bill become law it would not be within the power of Congress to withhold payment, however enormous and extravagant the expenditures may become.

Such, Mr. Speaker, is the framework of the measure which has been constructed by the majority of the committee and presented us for consideration. The bill itself covers nearly seventy-three pages of printed matter and contains fifty-seven sections. In many, very many places it suggests and points the way by which the people of this country may be defrauded of their choice in the matter of representation in this House. Passing by the evident unconstitutionality of the measure and the utter want of any necessity for its enactment, it is to be condemned, from its beginning to its conclusion, for its attempt to legalize fraud, corruption, intimidation, and extravagant expenditure of the public funds. It is a bold and revolutionary effort by the dominant party to perpetuate their rule. It is utterly regardless of the rights of the people, and history will condemn it as infamous should it be put upon the statute-books and be enforced.

At the date of the last Presidential election, we are informed, there were about 54,649 election precincts in the United States, not including Arizona, Idaho, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming. Of course they will continually and rapidly increase in number as the country becomes more densely settled.

For each one of these precincts, three supervisors and any number of deputy marshals may be appointed.

For each State and Territory a board of canvassers, to consist of three persons and a clerk, may be appointed.

For each judicial district a chief supervisor may be appointed.

The salaries, fees, and allowances of this vast horde of officials, should this bill be enacted into law, together with other expenditures provided for, will be paid out of the Treasury, from time to time and from year to year, without the necessity of an appropriation or further action by Congress. Did time permit, Mr. Speaker, I would like much to go into the details of the bill and lay bare the enormous and unbridled powers which are conferred upon the officials whose creation and appointment are provided for, the striking and conspicuous absence of any check against an infringement by them upon the rights of the citizen, its reckless disregard of the autonomy, the dignity, and the power of the States—all to be done for the one and for the only purpose that the Republican party may prolong its possession and control of every branch and department of this Government at the expense of the health, the vigor, and the very life of the Republic.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I do most heartily concur in the opinion expressed a few moments ago by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CANDLER], that if there was no South there would be no election bill, and I will amend the remark of my friend by saying that if there was no negro there would be no election bill. The bill is intended for the South and for the South alone. It is true that its enforcement, under its provisions, may be possible in every Congressional district in this Union, but it will never be put into operation or enforced in any part of this country but the South.

No one will make the effort to have it enforced at the North. No one will dare to do so. The debate that has been had upon this bill conclusively shows that it is intended to be enforced in the South and nowhere else. Although there has been an apparent effort upon the part of the friends of this measure to be somewhat moderate in their expressions about the people of the Southern States, yet the South has been the object of their attacks and the subject of their abuse. But I am happy to say, Mr. Speaker, that, so far as I know, no one has alluded unkindly to the State from which I come. No one has charged that in Texas the colored man, by force or fraud, has been prevented from voting as he pleased.

In the district which I have the honor to represent there are many negroes, perhaps as many, if not more, than in any other district in my State, and I venture to make the assertion that no man, white or black, living in that district can be found who will say that any colored man in that district has ever been prevented from voting as he pleased, and a very large majority of the negroes in that State vote the Republican ticket. What I have said about the district I represent applies with equal force to the other Congressional districts in Texas.

Since the Democratic party came into power in Texas—now about fifteen years ago—the relations between the white and colored people have been amicable and peaceable. There is no reason why they should have been otherwise. The Democratic party in Texas has done much for the negroes of that State. Let me read you a statement made by Hon. L. S. Ross, the governor of Texas, showing what has been done by the State in educating negro children during the last ten years. It reads as follows:

The Democrats have been in power in Texas about fourteen years, but the present school system has been in operation only about ten years. During the last ten years the Democrats of Texas have paid to support public schools for the colored children as follows:

School year.	Colored children.	Pro rata.	Amount distributed.
1879-'80.....	57,701	$3.00	$173,103.00
1880-'81.....	66,777	3.00	200,331.00
1881-'82.....	68,015	3.25	221,048.75
1882-'83.....	73,341	3.61	272,357.70
1883-'84.....	80,055	4.50	360,252.50
1884-'85.....	103,536	5.00	517,680.00
1885-'86.....	115,941	5.20	622,893.20
1886-'87.....	124,842	4.75	592,999.50
1887-'88.....	125,515	4.50	564,817.50
1888-'89.....	135,184	4.00	540,736.00
Total.....			4,064,230.15

In ten years the colored scholastic population increased 134 per cent. and the white 113 per cent.

This information is reliable and has been taken from official records, and it establishes the fact that in the last ten years $4,064,230.15 has been expended in educating the colored children in Texas. This money, with the exception of such part of it as came from the interest-bearing securities held by the State and known as the "school fund," was raised by taxation, paid almost exclusively by the white people of Texas, for the negroes do not pay more than one-thirty-second part of the amount raised by taxation. The great majority of them do not pay even a poll-tax, and the State is unable to collect it. The burden of taxation is almost exclusively borne by the white people.

Nor is this all, for in addition to the benefits conferred upon the colored children by the public free schools, the State has erected and for years has had in operation a normal school for the education and training of colored school teachers to teach the colored children of the State. Not only have we done that, but we care for the colored lunatics and have a deaf and dumb and blind asylum for colored people. It may astonish gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber when I tell them that one of these asylums is in charge of a colored man who is an intense Republican.

The normal school of which I have spoken is also in charge of a colored man. But let me read you a further statement from Governor Ross. He says:

8. The permanent school fund of the State is increasing at the rate of about $1,000,000 per annum. The annual receipts of school funds are increasing by the interest on this increase of the permanent school fund of the State, the increase of the permanent county school fund, and by the extension of local taxation in school districts. The annual expenditures for school purposes for the fiscal year ending August 31, 1889, exceeded the expenditures for the year ending August 31, 1888, about $400,000.

The policy of the Democrats in paying 2,981 colored teachers $990,000 per annum, in caring for colored lunatics at a cost of $40,000 per annum, in supporting the colored normal at about $29,000 per annum, in supporting their deaf and dumb and blind asylum, say, $15,000 per annum—altogether about $665,000 yearly—is not easily understood away up North.

No, it is not understood; and the South is not understood by a vast majority of the people of the North. It is to be regretted that the people of the South and of the North do not know each other better, for I am sure that if they did designing political wire-pullers would not dare to introduce such a diabolical measure as the one under consideration.

Mr. Speaker, the statement made by the governor of Texas shows that for the exclusive benefit of the negroes in that State there is now being annually expended nearly $700,000, and the greater part of this money is raised by taxes levied upon the white people of Texas. I do not hesitate to say that in Texas the negroes do not complain and ought not to complain of the manner in which they are treated by the white Democrats of that State.

Mr. COOPER, of Indiana. You kill them with kindness.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. No, sir; we do not kill them with kindness. The people of Texas believe that the way to qualify a man to exercise the great right of suffrage is to educate him. They believe that the best remedy for all the evils which may flow from "universal suffrage" is "universal education," and they have considered it proper to give to the colored people the advantages of a common-school education, and this they have done and are now doing with their own means, without aid from the Federal Government.

This is our record. It compares most favorably, I think, with the record of any State, North or South. It demonstrates whether the colored people in Texas are treated justly or not. I have before said that in the district I represent there are many colored voters, and I now say that I never knew of but two acts of violence committed upon colored men at the polls, and they were two Democratic negroes who were mobbed by Republican negroes for having voted a Democratic ticket. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

I have seen proper, Mr. Speaker, to make this statement in regard to the manner in which the colored people of my State are treated, because of the wholesale denunciations that have been made of the white people of the South. I have spoken only of Texas for the reason that I know more about Texas than I do of any other Southern State; but I know the Southern people well enough to say that they are incapable of perpetrating such crimes as are imputed to them by gentlemen on this floor. Of course there are exceptional instances of violence committed by white men upon negroes, and they are grossly exaggerated and worked up by scurvy Republican politicians in the South to create a prejudice in the North against the people of the South.

No man who reveres the Constitution of the United States can discuss this bill without adverting to its palpable and wicked violations of the organic law, but I shall not attempt to make an extended argument for the purpose of showing that it is unconstitutional. In my limited time I prefer discussing other than the unconstitutional features of the bill. I will content myself with briefly noticing that provision of the Constitution under which it is claimed that Congress has the power to enact such legislation as is contained in the pending bill. This authority is claimed under section 4 of Article I of the Constitution, which reads as follows:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

I can not believe that any intelligent and fair-minded man can think that Congress has the power to "make or alter such regulations" as may have been made by the States, until there has been a failure upon the part of the States to discharge their constitutional duty.

It is a power that is reserved in the Constitution of the Federal Government for the preservation of its existence, and its exercise should only be invoked when the emergency has arisen which imperatively requires such action upon the part of this Government. This is the construction that was placed upon this section of the Constitution by those who framed it. But, whatever may be said as to when and how this power may be exercised, no one pretends that this power can authorize the General Government to exercise any authority, or to interfere in any manner with the election of the officers of a State. That this bill does seek to control elections in the States, and to supervise such elections for State officers, as well as for the election of members of Congress, there can be no doubt.

In section 1 of the bill, in which are defined the duties of chief supervisors, may be found this language, that the chief supervisors are charged "with the supervision of elections at which Representatives or Delegates in Congress are voted for." In Texas, and I presume in most of the States, both State and county officers are voted for at the same time and upon the same ticket as members of Congress are voted for, and they are all elected at the same time and place, and it is plain that if this bill becomes a law the chief supervisors will be charged with the supervision of such elections.

In the exercise of their authority these supervisors are not limited to the election of members of Congress, but they are invested with authority to supervise "elections at which Representatives or Delegates in Congress are voted for." Now, I ask, under what provision of the Constitution can authority for such control on the part of this Government of State elections be found? Other provisions of the bill make it plain that it is intended to interfere with and control the election of State officers, and by "State officers" I mean those whose official duties are discharged within the limits of their respective States. In the second clause of section 8, supervisors are clothed with authority—

To challenge the right to register of any person offering himself for registration; also the right of any person found upon any registry book, list, or roll to be or remain thereon, and to require of any officer in charge, or who has the custody of any such registry book or list, to mark the name of any person found thereon for challenge.

Registration is had not only for those who vote for Representatives in Congress, but also for those who vote for State and county officers. Yet under this provision the Federal supervisor may challenge the right of any one to register, and it is a matter of indifference whether the challenged party intends to vote for one who aspires to be a Representative in Congress or for one who seeks to be the constable of a beat.

The supervisor can not only do this, but he can also object to those who are already registered, and can require the officer of a State who has been placed in charge of registration and in whose custody are the registration lists to mark the name of any one to whose registration he objects. I now call attention to the extraordinary power conferred upon supervisors in clause 7 of section 8 of the bill. The portion of said clause to which I invite attention reads as follows:

Seventh. To require the statutory oath or oaths to be immediately put to any voter whose right to vote shall be challenged, and in case the State, Territorial, or local election officers shall neglect or refuse to immediately put such oath or oaths, and to at once pass upon the qualifications of any such challenged person, then it shall be the duty of the chairman of the supervisors, or in his absence the duty of either of his associates who may be present, to, without delay, put such oath or oaths, whereupon the supervisors of election present shall promptly pass upon the qualifications of such person.

From this clause it appears that upon the happening of a contingency, that is to say, in case the State officers shall neglect or refuse to immediately put an oath or oaths to the voter and to at once pass upon the qualifications of the challenged party, the Federal supervisor shall without delay put such oath or oaths and promptly pass upon the qualifications of such person. This is an extraordinary power, for in determining upon the qualification of the challenged party he passes not only upon his competency to vote for Representatives in Congress, but also upon his competency to vote for State and county officers.

Again, clause 12 of section 8 provides that the supervisors shall have authority—

To make, in any city or town having 20,000 inhabitants or upward, when required by the chief supervisor, a list of all such persons as shall be naturalized in any court therein, the date of their naturalization, whether as a minor or otherwise, with the residence of such persons, their place of nativity, and the name and residence of their witnesses, and for such purpose, shall have at all times access to and the right to examine the original affidavits or applications presented or which have been presented to said courts and there filed. Such lists so made shall be filed in the office of the chief supervisor.

Naturalized citizens are qualified voters under State laws for State officers, and so far as these officers of the State are concerned, their right to vote should not be questioned by any one, and certainly not by a Federal supervisor of elections. If it is not intended to dispute the right of naturalized citizens to vote in any and all elections, why are these investigations made? And why should the names of such foreign-born citizens be filed in the office of the chief supervisor?

Under this provision a foreign-born citizen, no matter how long he may have been naturalized, no matter what service he may have rendered the country, becomes an object of suspicion and the subject of investigation by a partisan supervisor, and his name is placed on file with the chief supervisor as a "suspect." The Republican party can take to its loving embrace the negro, the black man, but discriminates against the foreign-born white man because of the accident of birth.

Other provisions of the bill might be referred to showing, as conclusively as those I have commented upon, that the attempt is being made to obtain control of the election of the various local officers of the various States, and if this bill shall pass and be approved it will be an utter subversion of the Constitution and the longest stride that has yet been taken towards centralization. In fact, centralization will have been accomplished, and the State governments will only exist in such manner as the General Government may graciously permit.

It was intended by the Constitution that the House of Representatives should be composed of the immediate representatives of the people, but if this bill becomes a law the voice of the people can, and doubtless will, be stifled by the mere tools of a political party. Who puts in motion the machinery provided for in this bill? Under some circumstances fifty citizens and under other circumstances one hundred citizens of a Congressional district can put the machinery in motion by making application to the chief supervisor, "petitioning that he will take such action as is requisite to secure such supervision therein as is provided by the laws of the United States."

Who these citizens are, whether respectable or not, are matters unknown to the people of the district; this knowledge is confided to the chief supervisor and the judge of the circuit court, if indeed they, or either of them, know anything about the applicants, and thus the voters of an entire Congressional district may be subjected to the annoyance and oppression of this proposed law upon the application of fifty or one hundred men, perhaps disreputable characters, who happen to be entitled to vote in that district.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is entitled "A bill to amend and supplement the election laws of the United States and to provide for the more efficient enforcement of such laws, and for other purposes."

It is well, Mr. Speaker, that the words "and for other purposes" are inserted in the title. Its chief purpose, and perhaps its sole purpose, is to perpetuate in power the Republican party. Grave apprehensions for the safety of the "grand old party" must be felt when such a desperate measure as the one under consideration is resorted to, at a time when that party is in possession of all the co-ordinate branches of the Government.

What is the matter? Are the Republicans afraid of the people? Are your policies of such character that you expect to be repudiated by the people? Is it because of this apprehension that you seek to obtain by the infamous provisions of this bill a majority in the next and succeeding Congresses which you know you can not obtain by a vote of the people? It would seem so.

This bill provides that the chief supervisor of the Congressional or judicial district receives his appointment not from the people, nor from any one elected by the people, but from a circuit judge of the United States, who is an appointee of the President, and whose tenure of office is for life and who for any misconduct is not directly amenable to the people, but can only be reached and punished by the slow and uncertain process of impeachment. That these chief supervisors may be removed as far as possible from the people, and not be accountable to them for the manner in which they discharge the duties of their position, they are not only appointed by a circuit judge, but, like the judge, hold their official position for life.

No officers but the Federal judiciary have heretofore been appointed to office for life, and the principal reason for appointing judges for life is to remove them from political influences; but this bill drags the ermine of the Federal judges through the mire and filth of partisan politics. In violation of all precedent this bill creates a political office, or rather many political offices, and provides that those who may be appointed to these offices shall hold them for life. Certainly this is not only a new but a very dangerous departure from established usage, and is contrary to the genius of our Government.

Not only do these chief supervisors hold their positions for life, but are clothed with dangerous power. Let us examine and see with what authority the chief supervisors and those subject to their control are invested. Upon receiving the petition of the fifty or one hundred citizens, as the case may be, "petitioning that he will take such action as is requisite to secure such supervision as is provided by the laws of the United States," it becomes the duty of the chief supervisor of a district to apply to the circuit judge of the United States, in whose circuit his district may be, for the appointment of additional supervisors for said district; and this chief supervisor suggests to the judge who shall be appointed, and upon his suggestion the circuit judge makes the appointment of such additional supervisors.

When these appointments are made, the chief supervisor selects from the list of additional supervisors three for each voting place, two of whom are required to be of one political party and the other one of another political party. Under the existing law, which this bill proposes to repeal, two supervisors may be appointed in cities of a required population, I believe of not less than 20,000 inhabitants, and one of the supervisors must be from one of the great political parties and the other must be a member of another and different political party. Now, if it be the purpose of this bill to secure perfect fairness in the conduct of elections, why should one political party be given the advantage in the selection of supervisors?

Why should a majority of the supervisors be selected from one political organization? This feature of the bill clearly condemns it, and shows that fairness in the conduct of the election of Representatives in Congress is not wanted or intended. The chief supervisor can, in his discretion, transfer the assistant or subordinate supervisors from one voting place to another in the same district. He can relieve or suspend from duty assistant supervisors and put others of the same political faith in their place. He has authority to appoint the chairman of the board of supervisors at each voting precinct, and can remove such chairman and appoint another in his place when it pleases him to do so. All assistant supervisors are subject to the instructions and control of the chief supervisor.

Invested with these and other powers of which I have spoken, the chief supervisor is placed in position to control and determine the result of Congressional elections in many districts. Does any one doubt that he will do it? He can not only do this, but in many instances he will be able to control and determine the election of State and county officers.

But, notwithstanding all these powers conferred upon the chief supervisor and his assistants in the Congressional districts, the bill would not be complete for the accomplishment of its purpose without a "returning board." The Republicans know the value of a returning board, and have in this bill constructed one that will effectually enable a sufficient number of their party to hold the certificates of election from these boards to give them a "working majority" in the House of Representatives.

The bill provides:

Sec. 15. It shall be the duty of each chief supervisor of election, on or before the 1st day of September next following the passage of this act, to cause a judge of the circuit court of the United States in his judicial district to be informed in writing that it is necessary that the circuit court should be opened for the purpose of complying with the provisions of this section.

It shall be the duty of the circuit judge who shall be so informed, on or before the 1st day of October next following the date of any communication containing such information, to personally open and hold a circuit court of the United States in such judicial district in such one of the States comprising his judicial circuit as shall be most convenient to him, and within ten days thereafter the said circuit court, so held by said circuit judge, shall, for each State within the said judicial circuit, appoint three persons of good standing and repute, citizens of the United States and citizens and residents of the State for which they shall be appointed, who shall be known as the United States board of canvassers of the Congressional vote within and for the State for which they shall be appointed; one of said three persons shall, when appointed, be named as chairman of the board. Such persons shall be sworn to the faithful performance of their duty and to support and defend the Constitution of the United States. They shall each hold their office so long as faithful and capable, and not more than two of them shall belong to the same political party; they shall each receive a salary of $15 a day for each day actually employed in the work of canvassing the statements and certificates of ballots cast at any election, general or special, for a Representative or Delegate in Congress and a further sum of $5 per day for their personal expenses. They shall have a seal and may appoint a clerk, who shall receive $12 a day for his services and expenses while actually in attendance upon said board. As a board it shall be the duty of such appointees of the said circuit court to convene on the 15th day of November of each even year, unless the same shall fall upon Sunday, when they shall convene on the following day. In case of a special election they shall convene one week from the day of such special election. They shall so convene at such place in their State as shall be most convenient for them, which place must, however, be a place where a term of the circuit court of the United States is by law regularly held, and there proceed to finally canvass and tabulate the votes which shall have been stated and certified to as cast for Representative or Delegate in Congress in each Congressional district in their State in and throughout which this act shall have been enforced, and not elsewhere, and shall declare and certify the result of the election thereof in each such district.

The determination arrived at and stated in the declarations and certificates of any such United States board of canvassers shall, as to each such Congressional district, be at once made public, and the declaration and certificate for each Congressional district shall be made in triplicate, be signed by each member of the board, and have affixed thereto the seal of said board; one shall be filed in the office of the chief supervisor of elections, under whose supervision the Congressional district covered by it was, together with all the papers and documents used, or which might by law be used, before such board for the purpose of ascertaining, declaring, and certifying the result in said Congressional district; another shall be forwarded by mail to the person found by them to have been elected, addressed to him at his place of residence; the third copy shall be similarly forwarded to the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States at Washington. In case no person be found duly elected in any district a certificate of that fact shall be made by said board in triplicate, under their hands and seals, and forwarded as follows: One to the governor of the State, another to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, and the third to the proper chief supervisor of elections.

The final declaration and certificate of said board as to the result in each and every Congressional district shall be completed and transmitted to the Clerk of the House of Representatives as soon as practicable, and in no event later than the last day of the month in which by law said board is to convene.

Sec. 16. Upon the receipt by the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the declaration and certificate of any United States board of canvassers of the Congressional vote as to the election of any Representative or Delegate in Congress it shall be the duty of that officer to open and file the same in his office. If by such declaration and certificate it shall appear that another and different person has been elected as a Representative or Delegate in Congress than the person certified as elected by such officer or officers of the State in which such Congressional district is situated, whose duty it is by the laws of the State to make such certificate, then the person so certified as elected by the declaration and certificate of the United States board of canvassers shall be, by the said Clerk of the House of Representatives, placed upon the rolls of persons elected as Representatives or Delegates in Congress, and the provisions of existing law respecting the names of persons who shall be placed upon the roll of the House of Representatives by the Clerk thereof are modified to the extent herein provided, and to such extent only. Any Clerk of the House of Representatives who shall neglect, fail, or refuse to place upon the roll of Representatives and Delegates the name of any person entitled to be placed thereon as provided by the laws of the United States, shall be liable to arrest, and upon conviction of such neglect, failure, or refusal, shall be punished by a fine not less than one thousand nor more than five thousand dollars, or by imprisonment for not less than one nor more than five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, and shall be forever disqualified from holding thereafter any office of trust or profit under the Government of the United States.

These provisions of the bill complete the machine. With a majority of the supervisors Republicans, and with a majority of the board of State canvassers Republicans and with the present Clerk of the House of Representatives a Republican, what impediment is in the way of Republican success? The certificate of election issued by this board of canvassers to one as a duly elected Representative in Congress overrides and sets aside any certificate of election that may be issued to another person as such elected Representative by the duly constituted authorities of a State.

If the certificate of election issued by the authority of a State coincides with the statement of the result of a Congressional election as shown by the certificate of the board of canvassers, it is all right; but if it differs therefrom, it amounts to nothing. If this is not the destruction of the rights of a State, and centralization pure and simple, I know not what it is. But, notwithstanding all the machinery to be found in this bill to perpetuate in power the Republican party, there will be found in the common sense of the people, in their love of liberty and devotion to representative government, an impassable barrier to its success.

Mr. Speaker, there are seventy-three pages in this bill and it will be difficult to find a section in it not repugnant to every principle of free government and abhorrent to the sense of justice of every right-thinking man. I have characterized it as a machine, and it is nothing but a machine, said to have been devised by John I. Davenport, of New York, for the purpose of keeping in place and power the Republican party.

The supervisors superintend and assist in counting the ballots, and in doing this they not only count the ballots cast for Representatives in Congress, but also those given for State and county offices. Under the pretense of verifying the registration lists, or of ascertaining who are qualified voters, the supervisors can make a house-to-house canvass and will draw pay from the Government as "workers" for the Republican candidates.

I might speak of other features of this bill—how districts may be overrun and terrorized by United States deputy marshals and how the strong arm of the military power of this Government, under the pretext of enforcing the provisions of this bill, may be used in striking down the dearest rights of a free people—but I have not time. If the bill becomes a law all these evils will soon be made manifest. Never in the history of this Union has a measure so destructive of the right of the people to representation in this Government been presented to the consideration of the American Congress.

A quarter of a century has elapsed since the close of the war between the States, and it would seem that time enough had passed to soften the asperities begotten by the unhappy strife and that kind relations should now exist between the sections, and I am sure that such relations would exist but for the Republican party, whose leaders continually fan the fires of sectionalism and keep them in a blaze for party purposes.

In order to retain power they must wave the "bloody shirt" and keep Northern prejudice aroused against the people of the South. During the dark days of reconstruction the South suffered much more than the people of the North know, and as I believe all information in regard to reconstruction is germane to this debate, I shall, in connection with my remarks, print in the RECORD a short history of reconstruction in Texas that I prepared for a book called "Why the Solid South?"

But in the reconstruction period, when passion engendered by the war that had just terminated was at a white heat, no such measure as the one under consideration was suggested or proposed by the wildest leaders of the Republican party of that day. Great as were the excesses of that period, and great as were their efforts to acquire party strength by creating or endeavoring to create negro supremacy in the South, no Republican leader of that period was so unmindful of the Constitution of his country as to advocate a measure like the one under consideration.

In the last few years, Mr. Speaker, you and others have heard and read much of "the new South." There is a "new South" created by the brain and brawn of the sons of the old South, who have been assisted very largely by Northern capital. The development of the material resources of the South has been marvelous, and its progress and prosperity is perhaps unparalleled in the history of this country. In my soul I believe that one of the objects sought to be accomplished by this bill is to paralyze the industries of the South and to check its growth in wealth and power. You know that the South is Democratic and ever will be Democratic to the core, and rather than see it continue to grow in population and strength, and thereby imperil the life of the Republican party, you prefer its destruction. But you can not destroy it. The South will keep right on in its march of progress and prosperity.

The intention of this bill is to harass the people of the South—to produce race troubles, to provoke disturbances of the peace, and perhaps the shedding of blood. But you forget that the people of the South have suffered much, and that because of their suffering they have acquired the virtue of patience. They will obey the law, and more; they will see to it that it is properly enforced, wherever it may be invoked in the South, without any sacrifice of their honor or manhood.

APPENDIX.

RECONSTRUCTION IN TEXAS.

What is known as the ordinance of secession, by which Texas was separated from the United States, was passed in a convention composed of delegates elected by the people of Texas, on the 1st day of February, A. D. 1861, and soon thereafter Texas became one of the Confederate States. In the war that followed between the States, it is no more than just to say that Texas discharged her full duty to her sister States of the South; but when the war closed, aside from the loss of property in slaves, the wealth of the State had not been so impaired as it had been in the other Southern States. She had not suffered devastation from invading troops, and those of her citizens who were not in the army had pursued their avocations without disturbance. The earth had brought forth abundantly, so much so as not only to supply the demand for home consumption, but to furnish large supplies for those who were in the field.

When hostilities ceased large quantities of cotton remained unsold in the hands of the planters, and at that time commanded an unprecedented high price. Farming acreage had been largely increased by those who with their slaves had fled from the ravages of the war in other States and had found refuge in Texas. The great live-stock interests in the State had prospered, and horses and cattle were easily converted into cash at remunerative prices. In comparison with the other States of the South, Texas was in a prosperous condition, and soon attracted the attention of those adventurers who everywhere became known as "carpet-baggers." To them Texas was indeed "a land flowing with milk and honey." They sent no one out to spy out the land, but came themselves. Their name was legion. Their purpose was to despoil and plunder. The military government which dominated the people during the greater part of the reconstruction period furnished them every opportunity to carry out their thievish purposes.

During that period the officers of the State, from the judge on the bench to the constable of a beat, were largely composed of this class of men, and it is but the plain truth to say that no more ignorant, incompetent, vicious, and corrupt men have ever been permitted by any government to hold official position. To their unparalleled meanness may be attributed much of the wrong and oppression that was inflicted upon the people of this State. Under Confederate authority Texas was a part of what was known as the "Trans-Mississippi Department," and at the termination of actual hostilities it was under the command of Lieutenant-General E. Kirby Smith, who, through Generals Buckner and Price, surrendered the department to General Canby, of the United States Army, at New Orleans, on the 27th day of May, 1865.

On the 17th day of June, A. D. 1865, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, issued his proclamation appointing Andrew J. Hamilton provisional governor of Texas, whose duty it was stated in the proclamation to be "to prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper for convening a convention composed of delegates to be chosen by that portion of the people of said State who are loyal to the United States, and no other; for the purpose of altering or amending the constitution thereof; and with authority to exercise within the limits of said State all the powers necessary and proper to enable the loyal people of the State of Texas to restore said State to its constitutional relations to the Federal Government, and to present such a republican form of State government as will entitle the State to the guaranty of the United States therefor, and its people to the protection of the United States against invasion, insurrection, and domestic violence."

Governor Hamilton was a native of Alabama, but had been a citizen of Texas for many years. He was in many respects a remarkable man, and had been more than once elected to high official position by the people of Texas, and at the time of secession he was a Representative from Texas in the Congress of the United States. Hamilton was a man of generous impulses and of extraordinary intellectual power, but was erratic and unstable in his opinions. At one time he was greatly admired by the people of Texas, and for years before the war they delighted in calling him "Colossal Jack," which was but an appropriate indication of his intellect and great oratorical ability. He had opposed secession, and shortly after the commencement of hostilities had placed himself within the lines of the Union forces, where he remained until the war was over, but at no time did he take up arms against the South.

Some complaint was made because of his delay in calling a convention to form a constitution. But after having reorganized the State by appointing all county, district, and State officers except judges of the supreme court, he, on the 17th day of November, A. D. 1865, issued his proclamation for the election of delegates to a convention, which assembled on the 7th day of February, 1866, and framed a constitution that was submitted to the voters of the State, ratified, and the officers of the State therein provided for elected on the 25th day of June, A. D. 1866.

Notwithstanding many of the citizens of the State were then under political disabilities and could not vote, the Democratic candidate for governor, Hon. James W. Throckmorton, received 49,277 votes, and his opponent, Hon. E. M. Pease, a Republican, received only 12,168 votes.

Governor Throckmorton had lived in Texas from his boyhood and had served his State for many years in the capacity of a legislator, and was distinguished for his ability, patriotism, purity of character, and unflinching courage. He was opposed to the secession of the Southern States from the Federal Union and had exerted his influence to prevent it, and as a delegate in the secession convention in 1861 voted against the passage of the ordinance which declared the separation of Texas from the Union. But while he looked upon secession as impolitic and ruinous, he looked with scarcely less dread upon that doctrine which asserted an undefined and unlimited power in the General Government to use its military force against the States, and he followed the fortunes of a majority of his fellow-citizens and shared with them the fate of the conflict. He was inaugurated and entered upon the discharge of his duties as governor on the 9th day of August, 1866, and no man in that high position was ever surrounded by more embarrassing circumstances or confronted with greater difficulties. He had a full appreciation of his situation and clearly perceived the obstacles that he had to overcome, as is manifest from the following passage in his inaugural address, namely:

"At a time like the present, when we have just emerged from the most terrible conflict known to modern times, with homes made dreary and desolate by the heavy hand of war; the people impoverished under public and private debts; the great industrial energies of the country sadly depressed; occupying, in some respects, the position of a State of the Federal Union, and, in others, the condition of a conquered province, exercising only such privileges as the conqueror in his wisdom may allow; the loyalty of the people to the General Government doubted; their integrity questioned; their honest aspirations for peace and restoration disbelieved, maligned and traduced, with a constant misapprehension of their most innocent actions and intentions; with a frontier, many hundreds of miles in extent, being desolated by a murderous and powerful enemy; our devoted frontiersmen filling bloody graves, their property given to the flames or carried off as booty, their little ones murdered, and their wives and daughters carried into captivity more terrible than death, and reserved for tortures such as savage cruelty and lust can alone invent; unprotected by the Government we support; with troops quartered in the interior where there is peace and quiet; unwilling to send citizens to defend the suffering border for fear of arousing unjust suspicions as to the motive; with a heavy debt created before the late war and an empty treasury; with an absolute necessity for a change in the laws to adapt ourselves to the new order of things, and embarrassments in every part of our internal affairs; under such circumstances, with such surroundings, when so much depends upon prudence and so great an amount of patriotism and intelligence is required, I feel sadly oppressed with the duties which lie before me."

But, notwithstanding the almost insuperable difficulties that stood in his way, the governor, assisted by the Legislature, went bravely to work to bring order out of chaos and to restore proper relations between the State and Federal Government. The convention that had framed the constitution, and which was composed of men of all political parties, had done everything required of it to facilitate the restoration of such relations. The abolition of slavery was recognized; the debt created by the war was repudiated; the ordinance of secession was declared null and void; the right of Texas to secede from the Union renounced, and the permanency of the Union and supremacy of the laws of the United States declared.

Provision was made for the future education of the negroes; for the equal preservation of their lives, liberty, and property, and for the bestowal of other rights and privileges upon them; and the right to vote would have been extended to them had it then been required by the General Government, for our people felt that they had submitted these matters to the arbitration of the sword; that it had been decided against them, and as brave men that it was their duty to submit.

The governor recommended the enactment of such laws as would in good faith carry out the provisions of the constitution and ordinances of the convention, and the Legislature promptly complied with his suggestion. So desirous was Governor Throckmorton that everything should be done by the Legislature to bring about proper relations between the State of Texas and the General Government, that on the 23d day of October, A. D. 1866, he addressed a telegram to President Johnson and made inquiry if he could offer any suggestion for further action on the part of the Legislature of Texas that would facilitate restoration; to which the President replied as follows:

"WASHINGTON, D. C., October 30, 1866.

"Governor THROCKMORTON: Your telegram of the 29th instant received. I have nothing to suggest further than urging upon the Legislature to make laws involving civil rights as complete as possible so as to extend equal and exact justice to all persons, without regard to color, if it has not been done. We should not despair of the Republic. My faith is strong, my confidence unlimited in the wisdom, providence, virtue, intelligence, and magnanimity of the great mass of the people, and that their ultimate decision will be, uninfluenced by passion and prejudice engendered by the recent civil war, for the complete restoration of the Union by the admission of loyal Senators and Representatives from all the States to the respective Houses of the Congress of the United States."

"ANDREW JOHNSON."

In his efforts to restore proper relations with the General Government, Governor Throckmorton was not without hope that he would be sustained by the sentiment of the Northern people, as was indicated in his message to the Legislature, wherein he said:

"Notwithstanding the difficulties which beset us, and the untoward direction given to measures proposed for the settlement of grave questions growing out of the late unhappy contest between the Government and the Southern States, and notwithstanding the measures so proposed have received the sanction of the National Legislature, yet, my fellow-citizens, with proper conduct on our part, I do not despair of receiving liberal and generous treatment from our Northern countrymen."

He never doubted, and never had cause to doubt, that his own people were desirous of performing all their obligations to the General Government, and this he declared in his inaugural address in the following emphatic language:

"Having been a resident of Texas for a quarter of a century; familiarly acquainted with her prominent citizens; having served in the councils of the State for fifteen years, and shared the dangers and toils of the late war with her soldiers; recently mingled much with the people and corresponded with them in every section of the State within the past few months, I claim to know something of the actual condition of affairs, and I do not hesitate to declare that the great body of the people are earnestly desirous of performing all their obligations to the General Government. A people who have won the respect and admiration of the world for their chivalry, high daring, and fortitude will not be doubted by generous and brave spirits when they assert their loyalty."

It was, indeed, true that the people, after the exhaustion caused by four years of war, were in favor of a restoration of law and order that would give security to life and property. They were anxious to begin the work of rebuilding their shattered and ruined fortunes, realizing that a continuance of a condition of hostility to the Federal Government would be fatal to their hopes and plans. But events which rapidly followed the utterance by Governor Throckmorton of these words of cheer and hope painfully demonstrated that the people of the North were not ready to resume fraternal relations with the people of the South. Perhaps there had not been sufficient "cooling time." In spite of State constitutions and legislative enactments evincing the honest desire of the people of the Southern States to accept in good faith the results of the war and to resume their relations with the General Government, the people of the Northern States doubted their loyalty to the Government of the United States, and were especially apprehensive that fair treatment would not be given to the negro. They regarded crime in the South not as an excrescence of society, but as the indirect act of Southern society itself, and deemed it right to assume tutelage over the people of the South.

The breach that occurred between President Johnson and his party, which culminated in the attempt made to impeach him, only intensified the bitterness of feeling at the North against the people of the South, and, in less than nine months after the formation of a State government in Texas, resulted in the passage of the reconstruction laws, and subverted civil government, not only in Texas but in all the Southern States, and in lieu thereof erected a military despotism.

But before the enactment of the reconstruction laws Texas was in the condition described by her governor as "occupying, in some respects, the position of a State of the Federal Union, and in others, the condition of a conquered province;" and this anomalous condition of things was a prolific source of trouble and embarrassment in the administration of State affairs.

As has been shown, a government for the State, essentially republican in its nature, and the constitution of which had provided for the changes brought about by the war, had been organized in due form; but the Government of the United States, under the pretense of collecting property that had belonged to the Confederate States, kept within the State a body of soldiers, who were stationed at different points, and some of whom, in small and separate detachments, were kept moving from one place to another.

The "Freedmen's Bureau" had its officers and agents everywhere throughout the State, and in many if not most instances they had a military force subject to their orders. These officers and agents of the "Freedmen's Bureau" were, for the most part, a set of unmitigated rascals. Sent to protect the negro against the cruelty and rapacity of his employer, they managed to pluck from him his hard-earned dollars, and not unfrequently they were in the pay of the employer, who, from necessity, submitted to be blackmailed rather than be subjected to constant and unnecessary annoyance.

The presence of the soldiers for the enforcement of law in a time of profound peace is revolting to an American, and at this unhappy period the conduct of the soldiers was very often of such a character as to exasperate the citizens. Where officers were in command who were possessed of a proper sense of self-respect, and knew how to perform their duties, but little if any trouble occurred. But, unfortunately, such men were not always in command, and too frequently men were in authority who sought to display their love of country and heroism by oppressing the helpless.

Such conduct not unfrequently produced trouble. Many of our citizens suffered in person and in property at the hands of licentious and irresponsible men who wore the uniform and marched under the flag of the United States. One of the most flagrant acts of this character was the burning of the town of Brenham on the night of the 7th of September, A. D. 1865. It excited great indignation throughout the State. The Legislature was in session at the time, and the governor very properly and prudently called their attention to the matter.

In compliance with the recommendation of the governor the Legislature sent a committee to Brenham fully authorized to obtain the facts, and from the report made by said committee we learn that on the night of the 7th of September a party of United States soldiers took possession of a negro ball that was in progress in the house of a colored man in the town of Brenham. The conduct of the soldiers became so indecent as to cause the negroes to abandon their festivities and seek their homes. Infuriated because the ball had ceased, they sought to inflict vengeance upon some of the negro men who had helped to close it. They pursued one of them to a house where were assembled a number of white ladies and gentlemen, and within their hearing, in the most profane and obscene language, abused the negro.

Upon being informed by one of the gentlemen that ladies were present, and requested not to use improper language, they drew their pistols and transferred their abuse from the negro to the white men, and cursed them as d—n rebels, and threatened to shoot them, when two of the soldiers were shot, one being seriously and the other slightly wounded. The soldiers then retired to their camp, taking their wounded companion with them, but during the night they returned and fired the town. It was indisputably proved that the soldiers set fire to the town. The evidence showed that the soldiers who committed this outrage acted under the orders of their commanding officer, or that he connived at their conduct. When an officer of the State went to their camp with the authority of the law to arrest some of the guilty parties he was informed by the officer in command that the soldiers he wanted had the night before deserted. They certainly had been spirited away and have never been tried for their crime.

Quite a number of houses were consumed, and property to the value of $131,000 was destroyed. The loss was sustained and divided among about twenty-five persons, all of whom were of moderate means and not able to sustain it. The burning of Brenham was exceptional only in the amount of property that was destroyed; certainly not in perfidy and wickedness. Numbers of our citizens were murdered by the soldiers of the United States, and, in some instances, were deliberately shot down by them in the presence of their wives and children. In this diabolical manner were W. A. Burns and his son, Dallas, murdered in Guadalupe County. From the testimony taken before the coroner at an inquest held upon the bodies of the deceased, we copy the evidence of Sarah L. Burns, who was a witness to the horrid deed, and whose testimony was abundantly corroborated by other evidence. After being duly sworn, she testified as follows:

Q. State what you know about the killing of your father, W. A. Burns, and your brother, Dallas Burns.

A. Between midnight and day on Sunday morning, March 31, 1867, there came a body of men and surrounded the house of W. A. Burns, and demanded the surrender of the house and all that was in it, in the name of the United States. My brother Dallas told them to wait until morning and they would surrender. They then tried to open the door, and my brother Matt told them that if they broke open the door that he would shoot them. They then said that if they did not surrender they would set fire to the house. They then told my father that they would give him until they could count twenty to surrender, and if he did not surrender in that time that twenty would fire into the house and forty would remain. When they counted nineteen my father told them to stop. They then told my father that they would give him until they could count five to surrender, and if he did not surrender in that time they would set fire to the house. They then counted four, and my father told them to stop, that he would surrender. My father then called for the captain, and told him to come in and act like a gentleman and tell what they wanted. At that time one of the party said, "Here is the captain," and called to the captain, and said that Burns wished to see him. The captain came in and several other men at the same time. My father tried to keep back the crowd, and some one of the party said, "Burns, you shall not be hurt." They then remarked that there were four gentlemen in here, and asked if Dallas Burns was present, and said to him, "Step out;" and then said, "Matt Burns, are you here?" and told him to "step out," and at the same time they commenced firing. When they commenced firing I jumped up and ran to the door and commenced screaming. After the firing had ceased they walked out of the house and were laughing, and about that time there was another shot fired, and I heard some one say, "Oh, my son Johnny, are you hurt?"

Dallas Burns made a dying statement, in which he said: "A body of men came to the house and demanded a surrender. This we refused for some time. The captain then came to the door and talked with father, and told him he did not wish to hurt him, but merely to arrest my brother Matt and myself under military authority. Upon that we surrendered. The captain came in and made a motion to his men, and a portion of their crowd, say five or six, came into the house and cocked their guns. The captain called for Dallas Burns. I hesitated, and was rather slow about coming out, and the captain said, 'Step out, damn you, and take it, for you have it to do,' when I stepped out in the light, and they fired upon me."

After the perpetration of this atrocious murder the officer who was in command of the soldiers who did it issued a proclamation in which he denounced citizens of the county as "rebels" and "thieves," and declared that for the commission of offenses "no quarter should be given."

It gives no pleasure to record these instances of cruelty and outrage that were perpetrated by the troops of the United States upon citizens of our State, but they serve to show the dangers always incident to if not inseparable from the exercise of military power. Let no one suppose that the instances given were isolated cases of oppression that might occur under any government, however good. They were of such frequent occurrence as to excite the alarm of good people throughout the State. No constitutional barriers stood in the way of military authority, and it seemed to have no respect for the rights and privileges that have always been held sacred and inviolable by American citizens. Any good citizen was subject to arrest and imprisonment who had incurred the ill-will of some negro or the animosity of some degraded white man, who perhaps had been a blatant secessionist, but for purposes of gain denied his record and loudly proclaimed that he had ever been devoted to the Union. Governor Throckmorton had much correspondence with the military authorities in Texas in regard to the various and many acts of oppression which our citizens had to endure and did everything that could be done for their relief. In one of his letters to General Sheridan, he says:

"I know some of the veriest rogues and scoundrels, who to protect themselves, have applied to the military, and asserted that they were in danger because of their Unionism, when in truth their Unionism was never heard of until after the surrender." This was unfortunately true in too many instances, as is known by those who then lived in Texas. The war had brought about a very upheaval of society, and had thrown to the surface the worst element it contained, and this condition of affairs was recognized by the negro when he said, "The bottom rail has got on top."

But nothing could stop the despotism of hate, and all efforts were unavailing to stay the heavy hand of military power. The reign of terror continued, and outrages upon our citizens were of almost daily occurrence. It would require too much space to give an account of all the oppressive acts of the military, and the wrongs that were inflicted upon individuals in the State. The military authorities professed to abhor crime, and were ever ready to excuse themselves for their arbitrary conduct, because of the necessity of suppressing it, and yet with unblushing effrontery asked Governor Throckmorton that he at once extend his pardon to two hundred and twenty-seven negro convicts in the State penitentiary. These negroes were guilty of almost every offense known to our criminal laws. It was, as a matter of course, assumed that they had not been fairly tried, and that their conviction was the result of prejudice and a disposition on the part of those who tried them to deny them fair treatment.

The absurdity of this assumption was shown by the governor in his reply to the application, and as said reply gives a true statement of the treatment of colored persons charged with crime accorded to them by our law and the manner of its enforcement by our courts, I will, notwithstanding its length, give it in full, namely:

"EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT OF TEXAS, Austin, March 13, 1867.

"GENERAL: I have examined carefully the communication of W. H. St. Clair, Inspector Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, addressed to Lieut. I. F. Kirkham, assistant adjutant-general, on the 25th ultimo, concerning the freed people who are convicts in the State penitentiary, together with the accompanying papers which were placed in my hands a few days since by you. In answer to the suggestions contained in the communication referred to, and the request made through it by Major-General Griffin that a pardon be granted the convicts alluded to (numbering in all two hundred and twenty-seven), I most respectfully submit that my duty as the chief magistrate of this State, having in charge a due enforcement of the laws and the well-being of the people of every class and color, precludes the indiscriminate action on my part that is desired.

"It will be seen by reference to the report made by the inspector that these persons are confined for various offenses, many of them of the gravest character, including murder, rape, assault with intent to commit rape, arson, robbery, burglary, assaults with intent to murder, aiding prisoners in jail to escape, and theft. The great majority are for theft, and in many instances for stealing small amounts. But it should be kept in mind that the same law was applicable and operated alike upon white persons, and that a party is just as guilty of crime should the offense be for the stealing of one cent as for one million, though the punishment is greater or less in proportion to the amount stolen.

"It will be observed that in almost every case the conviction has been for the shortest period of time allowed by law. For your information and that of the authorities who are charged with the well-being of the freed people, I will state, that under our laws, no person, white or black, can be prosecuted in our courts for a criminal offense without having counsel to conduct their defense. If they are too poor to employ counsel, or do not do so, it is the duty of the court to appoint counsel for them unless such party should see proper to make their own defense. And I mention it as a fact honorable to the judiciary of this State, that it is the general custom in all such cases to appoint the most able and experienced members of the bar. I venture the assertion, with great confidence, that not a single convict was tried without having reliable and respectable counsel to defend the case and in no instance where a reasonable showing was made that witnesses material to the defense were absent have they been hurried or forced into trial without them.

"To show how tender the courts have been of the rights of this class of persons, I will mention a fact which should be known in connection with the case of the freedman, Richard Perkins. In this case Perkins was indicted for murder, and able counsel was assigned him by the court. He desired to enter the plea of guilty, and so expressed himself in court; but the State having all the witnesses present that had been subpoenaed in the case, the court would not permit him to do so.

"I have been witness repeatedly to the exertions made by counsel thus assigned in defense of such persons, and in some cases I know of acquittals that unquestionably would have been convictions had the parties on trial been of the white race.

"To the ears of persons who have been taught to believe that the people of the South are exasperated with and wish to oppress the negro this may appear strange, yet it is true. The great mass of our people—and I am quite sure the same sentiment has due weight with the judiciary—feel a sympathy for the negro, and, as jurors, make a double allowance for his situation and the temptations by which he has been beset in consequence of sudden emancipation. I would not be understood as asserting that this is true of every person, or every section, but it is the general feeling entertained by a great majority of our people. Nor would I be understood as asserting that in every case where negroes have been convicted, a due regard has been had for their situation and ignorance, nor that strict and impartial justice has in every instance been meted out to them.

"I deem it proper in this connection, as controverting the general charge made against our people of hostility to the negro, and of the same implied charge in Inspector St. Clair's statement, that in quite a number of cases memorials have been addressed to me, signed by the judges, officers of the law, members of the bar, and citizens, asking pardons for freedmen who have been convicted of various offenses, including homicides and other offenses, down to misdemeanors. Quite a number of pardons have been granted by me, including some of the lists sent up from the penitentiary. In every instance but one, the white persons making the applications for pardon have paid the fees of officers and costs of court, amounting usually from thirty to fifty dollars, and sometimes more in felony cases. Some petitions have been sent to me, signed by most respectable citizens, asking pardon for freedmen, that I have not granted because I did not think the cases presented came within the rule where executive clemency should be exercised.

"I would most respectfully remind the authorities that the class of freedmen now confined in the penitentiary, as a general rule, is the most vicious and dishonest of the entire freed population of the State. And, instead of astonishment being expressed at the number, I think it speaks well for the people themselves, and is a contradiction to the charge of white oppression that the number should be no greater than it is.

"At the time of the surrender, the black population of Texas could not have been less than 400,000. Since then a great reduction has occurred on account of the numbers who have returned to Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, and other States. Taking a period of two years, under the circumstances when there was no government of any kind in the State for several months, with the country demoralized by war, and with such a large number of the slaves suddenly emancipated, it is remarkable, indeed, that a greater number of crimes were not committed, and a much greater number of convictions had. In looking over the statements of the convicts I have been impressed with the falsehoods uttered by the convicts, and evidently relied upon by the agents, which would be apparent to any one acquainted with affairs in this State.

"Some killed hogs, others stole bacon, etc., because, as they said, they were hungry and their employers did not furnish rations. The great effort to procure and retain labor, if fair dealing was out of the question, makes such statements as these very improbable; nor do I believe them true. Quite a number acknowledged to the taking of the articles charged, but rendered as an excuse that the parties from whom they took them were in their debt; others made mistakes, and not a few said they did not do the stealing, but the property was found in their possession, etc. It will afford me much pleasure to co-operate with the authorities of the bureau in ascertaining the facts in any individual case, and whenever any reasonable cause can be shown why executive clemency should be exercised it will be freely and cheerfully extended. But these facts must come from the officers of the court where the parties were tried, or from citizens of respectability who are acquainted with the previous character of the convicts.

"I would say further that it is not the value or amount of the articles stolen that should influence interference in these cases. If the offender was of reasonably good character and habits previous to conviction, then it should have due weight; but if such character had been bad and vicious it should not be regarded. It is certainly a novel proceeding, and I can not believe it is justifiable, that an application of this character should be based upon the statement of the convicts. The course pursued by the inspector in raising in the minds of the convicts an expectation of release is, in my candid judgment, reprehensible, and can not fail to prove mischievous, and were I to release them, would prove of the greatest injury to them. It would be regarded as a license, and be an incentive to them to commit other offenses. I trust in the future the chief of the bureau will permit no further interference of this kind with the municipal and police regulations of this State.

"I must be allowed also to remark that the statements and implied censures of the inspector, St. Clair, towards the courts, people, and authorities of this State are neither courteous nor respectful; nor are they warranted by facts.

"I can not close this communication without stating to the officers of the bureau that I will, at all times and under all circumstances, afford them all the aid in my power to secure every right to the freed people of this State that is guaranteed by the laws of the State and General Government, and will be always ready to extend to these people the broadest mantle of mercy and charity where it can be done with due regard to their interests and a just respect for the interests of the whole body-politic.

"With sentiments of great respect, I am, general, most respectfully, your obedient servant,

"J. W. THROCKMORTON, Governor of Texas."

"Brigadier-General OAKER, Commanding United States forces, Austin, Texas."

No just man can find fault with Governor Throckmorton for refusing to pardon these convicts, and yet there is no doubt but that his refusal to pardon them was one of the reasons that induced General Sheridan to believe him to be "an impediment to the reconstruction of Texas under the law." It may be that General Sheridan had another reason for believing Governor Throckmorton to be an impediment to reconstruction. The governor, as was his duty, had applied to General Sheridan to place troops upon the frontier to protect our people from the depredations of Indians, and General Sheridan, in reply to this application, said: "There were more casualties occurring from outrages perpetrated upon Union men and freedmen in the interior of this State than occurs from Indian depredations upon the frontier." Governor Throckmorton replied to this statement made by General Sheridan, and said:

"General, this is truly a startling statement, and I exceedingly regret that you have been so unfavorably impressed with the general character of the people of Texas, and that your information should be so incorrect. I am frank to admit that many violations of law occur in the interior of Texas; but that these things are the result of rebellious sentiment among the people, or that the outrages committed in consequence of this rebellious feeling are far in excess of the Indian depredations upon the frontier, I must solemnly and emphatically deny. You have heard one side of the story. Perhaps if the people or authorities of Texas had been as persistent and mendacious in their version of these affairs to you and your officers as have been the howling crowd of canting, lying scoundrels who were doing everything in their power to make trouble and produce alienation of feeling between countrymen, you might not think so badly of us. I must positively assert that of all the outrages occurring in Texas since the surrender but the fewest possible number have originated out of the feeling alluded to by you."

This was a flat contradiction of the statement that General Sheridan had made, and it possibly irritated him. But this was not all. Governor Throckmorton, in replying to the charge made by General Sheridan, that the people of Texas had perpetrated such numerous outrages upon Union men and freedmen, saw fit to call the general's attention to the fact that much crime in Texas had been perpetrated by Federal soldiers in his command. For in another place in his letter he said:

"Suffer me to say that of the robberies committed upon freedmen in Texas a great number of them have been by soldiers in your command, and others who have been discharged or deserted from it. It is undoubtedly true that the negroes in the localities of the troops are more afraid of imposition from the soldiers than from any other quarter. Many of the outrages that have occurred in Texas have been perpetrated by deserters and discharged soldiers from the Army of the United States. A band of seventeen or eighteen in one body went to general robbing and are now in the State penitentiary. Another band of deserters from the Sixth Cavalry went directly north through the State from Waco and committed every species of outrage. Other squads who were discharged traveled through the State on their way north, sometimes representing a quartermaster and commissary and giving receipts, and in other places taking by force."

This probably was the "straw which broke the camel's back," and in the opinion of General Sheridan, made Throckmorton an "impediment." The reconstruction act of March 2, 1867, declared that no legal State governments or adequate protection for life or property existed in the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, Florida, Texas, and Arkansas, and divided said States into military districts, and subjected them to the military authority of the United States, and Louisiana and Texas were made the fifth military district. Said act, in section 6, also provides: "That until the people of said rebel States shall be, by law, admitted to representation in the Congress of the United States any civil government which may exist therein shall be deemed provisional only, and in all respects subject to the paramount authority of the United States, at any time to abolish, modify, control, or supersede the same."

Thus was the State government that had been organized by the people of Texas at the instance of, and by the authority of, the Federal Government, subordinated to the military authority of the United States, and he whom the people of Texas had elected governor of their State became subject to the order of an officer of the United States Army.

This was humiliating to Governor Throckmorton, and it was as much so to the people of Texas. With the hope of being able to serve his people and to some extent alleviate their situation, he sacrificed all personal feeling and devoted himself to their interests. He at once placed himself in communication with General P. H. Sheridan, who had been placed in command of the fifth military district, and signified his willingness to co-operate with him in the reorganization of the State. He wrote to General Sheridan as follows:

"EXECUTIVE OFFICE, Austin, March 30, 1867.

"GENERAL: Your telegram of yesterday in answer to mine of the 27th, informing me that Bvt. Maj. Gen. Charles Griffin has direction of the details of the reorganization of this State, is received. I think I am justified in the statement that the people of Texas will participate in the reorganization with great unanimity. While the people with very little division of sentiment regard the terms as onerous and oppressive, yet they are determined to abide the laws and comply with them. As the chief magistrate I shall lend a prompt assistance, when in my power, to carry into effect the laws referred to, and shall advise the people to participate in the reorganization with good feeling, and to the extent of securing to the newly enfranchised class the freest exercise of the privilege conferred. I have such assurances from various parts of the State, and from most intelligent and respectable citizens, that I apprehend General Griffin will have but little difficulty in the discharge of his delicate labors. The people will register promptly when called upon to avail themselves of all the privileges allowed. I feel confident in the hope that yourself and General Griffin will extend to the people every facility possible, in order that they may comply with the requirements of the law.

"I am, General, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"J. W. THROCKMORTON.

"Major-General SHERIDAN, Commanding Louisiana and Texas, New Orleans."

The foregoing letter was a manly acceptance of the situation, and notwithstanding the increased embarrassment of his position, caused by the action of Congress, Governor Throckmorton continued to discharge the duties of his office with the same energy and ability that had ever characterized his official conduct. Never for a moment did he cease to have the law rigidly but impartially enforced in every county, and but for the intermeddling of the military power would have prevailed throughout the State. He was ever ready to assist the military authorities in the discharge of their legitimate duties, and no request for aid of any sort that would facilitate reorganization of the State was made of him that he did not most cheerfully give. But at no time did he fail to protest against their usurpation of power and do his best to protect his people from cruelty and oppression. It was his fearless efforts to protect his people that led to his removal. On the 30th day of July, 1867, General Sheridan, who was in command of the Fifth Military District, issued the following order:

"[Special Order No. 105.]

"NEW ORLEANS, July 30, 1867.

"A careful consideration of the reports of Maj. Gen. Charles Griffin, United States Army, shows that J. W. Throckmorton, governor of Texas, is an impediment to the reconstruction of that State under the law. He is therefore removed from that office. E. M. Pease is hereby appointed governor of Texas, in place of J. W. Throckmorton, removed. He will be obeyed and respected accordingly.

"By command of Maj. Gen. P. H. Sheridan.

"GEORGE S. HARTRUFF,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

"Official:

"GEORGE LEE,

"First Lieutenant Twenty-first U. S. Infantry, Acting Assistant Adjutant-General."

When served with the above order, Governor Throckmorton published an address to the people of Texas, in which he gave a review of his official conduct, and showed that as governor he had not been an impediment to the reconstruction of that State, but had been an "impediment" to the despotic exercise of military power.

E. M. Pease, who was made provisional governor of Texas by order of General Sheridan, was an old citizen, who had been governor of the State before the war. The people of Texas had the right to expect from him, at least, fair treatment, but they were doomed to disappointment. Previous to the war he had been an ultra Democrat, but because of issues growing out of the war, he had become a Republican.

Differing with a large majority of the people of Texas about political matters, he became embittered in his feeling, and seemed to be imbued with hatred to those from whom he had obtained his wealth and position. Not long after he became provisional governor, he built for himself a monument of infamy that time will not destroy. This man Pease, in a letter to General W. S. Hancock, then commanding the Fifth Military District, libeled his people, and asked General Hancock to establish military tribunals—drum-head court-martials—for the trial of citizens who might be charged with offenses for the perpetration of which, if guilty, they were only amenable to the civil law.

The great soldier and hero spurned the proposition and indignantly refused to become a party to such crime. The just rebuke administered by General Hancock in his reply to the application made by Pease will not be soon forgotten by the American people. It is a production worthy of the pen of any of the fathers of the Republic. But, unfortunately, the views expressed by General Hancock did not accord with those entertained by the Administration at Washington, and he was soon removed, and one who knew less of the Constitution and more of tyranny became his successor. Civil law was again subverted and unlicensed military power was supreme. The people were helpless. Throckmorton, who had labored to protect them, was succeeded by one who had actually invited their oppression.

Military commissions sat in various sections of the State, and citizens of the highest respectability were brought before them and given a mere mockery of trial, and sentenced to ignominious punishment. The judges were appointed and removed at the pleasure of the military authorities, and very many of them had no higher conception of duty than to obey the behests of their masters. Those who dared to manifest independence of thought and action were not permitted to obstruct or defeat the purposes of those who were in authority, but were removed, and their places supplied with others of less capacity and honor. It was useless to ask such men to interpose their judicial authority for the protection of the citizen. They recognized no right but such as was graciously accorded by arbitrary power, and with them the writ of habeas corpus was not a writ of right, but an act of grace.

In one instance a United States district judge, when applied to for the writ of habeas corpus by a number of men who were on trial before a military commission, refused to make any order granting or refusing the writ, and gave as a reason for his refusal to act that he could not afford to do anything that would require of him a decision involving the constitutionality of the reconstruction laws.

The cowardly fear manifested by this judge well illustrates the condition of the country at that time and the awe that was inspired by military government.

What is known as the reconstruction convention assembled at the capitol in Austin on the 1st day of June, 1868. No one had been permitted to vote for the election of delegates to this convention who had not been registered, and the registration had been so managed by the military authorities as to give the entire control of it to negroes and carpet-bag Republicans. The result of such conduct was to prevent thousands of Democrats from being registered and the election of a majority of Republicans as delegates to the convention. After organization of the convention had been perfected, the provisional governor, E. M. Pease, sent to it a message, in which he told, but one truth about the people of Texas, and that was, "I knew that my appointment was distasteful to a large majority of the people of Texas who had participated in the rebellion, and who have heretofore exercised the political power of the State."

He was prolific in his suggestions, and advised a dismemberment of the State by selling a portion of its territory to the United States; and among other evidences of his littleness he said to the convention: "It is expected that you will temporarily disfranchise a number of those who participated in the rebellion, sufficient to place the State in the hands of those who are loyal to the United States Government;" the obvious meaning of which was the disfranchisement of enough Democrats to place in power for years to come the Republican party in Texas.

The constitution framed by this convention was, as might have been expected, filled with provisions which gave warrant for the exercise of despotic power, and it was ratified by the same class of voters who had authorized its creation. Under it an election for governor and other State officers was held, and Edmund J. Davis was counted in as governor of Texas by the military authorities of the United States. Davis was a native of Florida, but for many years had resided in Texas. During the war he had been a soldier in the Federal Army and had attained the rank of brigadier-general. He was a Republican, and so was his only opponent, Governor A. J. Hamilton, but Hamilton was more conservative in his views, and therefore more acceptable to the people of Texas.

The Democrats presented no candidate for governor, for it was evident that if a Democrat was elected he would not be permitted to fill the position. Such Democrats as were allowed to vote, and availed themselves of their privilege, supported Hamilton. There is no doubt but what Hamilton was elected. But it had been determined by those in power that he should not have the office. Many counties which gave large majorities to Hamilton were illegally thrown out, and other expedients were resorted to by those in authority to enable them to declare the election of Davis. So it was with the Legislature. It was officially declared that each house had a majority of Republicans, and thus, by skillful counting, any conflict between the executive and the legislative departments of the government were avoided.

The first Legislature after reconstruction that assembled in Texas, known as the Twelfth Legislature, has passed into history as the most venal and corrupt body that ever disgraced the State. Aside from purely political measures, it is said money was freely used to procure legislation and that there was scarcely any attempt at concealment. The lobby was thronged with shrewd and unprincipled men from almost every where, who were seeking to rob the State of both land and money. Charters, obtained to sell, were granted for almost every conceivable purpose. Governor Davis, though a bigot in politics, had the reputation of being an honest man, and he endeavored to check this character of legislation by the exercise of the veto power, but he could do no good, for the bills were passed by the requisite majority over his objections.

Bribery and corruption were the least of the evils with which the people of Texas had to contend. The party then dominant in the State had been so long accustomed to rely upon the military power of the United States that it seemed to be incapable of administering civil government, and its leaders recognized the fact that the government which they had organized for the State was not a "government of the people, by the people, and for the people," and could only be a government of force.

Governor Davis in his first message to the Legislature recommended "that a police system be adopted embracing the whole State under one head," and said that no system of laws for the suppression of crime, however severe, will be complete "without such powers are conferred on the executive as will enable him in any emergency to act with the authority of law."

What a spectacle was here presented! A man who claimed to have been elected the governor of one of the States of the Union demanding of the Legislature of that State that he be clothed with the authority of law for the exercise of despotic power. In this boasted land of liberty it is hard to realize that such a demand could have been made, but it is more difficult to believe that the Legislature complied with it. The governor also suggested to the Legislature "the question of making some provision for the temporary establishment of martial law." Evidently it was his design to subvert the liberties of the people and to have authority to maintain a government of force, and to this end he determined upon the organization of a military force that should be composed of such material as he desired.

The Legislature promptly responded to the demands of the governor, and passed several acts to enable him to carry out his wicked purpose. The first one we shall notice is an act entitled "An act to provide for the enrollment of the militia, the organization and discipline of the State guard, and for the public defense." By this act all able-bodied male citizens residing in the State, between the ages of eighteen and forty-five, were made subject to military duty, except certain classes therein mentioned, and the governor was made commander-in-chief of all the military forces of the State. The militia were, by the act, divided into two classes. One was called the "State guard of Texas," and the other the "reserve militia." It was declared that the State guard of Texas "shall consist of male persons between the ages of eighteen and forty-five, who shall voluntarily enroll and uniform themselves for service therein: Provided, The commander-in-chief [the governor] shall designate the number of men in each county in this State allowed to enroll in the State guard, and have the power to reject any person offering himself for enrollment in the same."

The reserve militia was composed of all persons subject to military duty who had not enrolled in the State guard. Thus was the governor enabled to organize troops without limit as to number, to be composed of a class of men that he wanted to execute his designs. A learned lawyer and distinguished citizen of Texas, not very long after the passage of this law, in commenting upon it, said, "We desire to call attention to the very important fact that this act permits able-bodied male citizens, residents in the State, to enroll in the reserve militia, but all persons without qualifications between the ages of eighteen and forty-five can enroll in the State guard provided they suit the purpose of the governor."

Why the distinction? The common sense of every man will suggest to his mind the answer. This State guard is peculiarly the governor's army, selected and organized out of such material as will serve his purposes. The reserve militia can only be composed of resident citizens of Texas, and perhaps would refuse to murder, rob, and pilfer their fellow-citizens should they be called upon to do so by the commander-in-chief. They are what this act designates them, "reserve." They can not act unless called out by the commander-in-chief. They remain unorganized, unarmed, and unequipped; but we find the State guard fully organized and equipped, scattered through every or nearly every county in the State, eating up the substance of the people, and in very many instances murdering innocent and unoffending citizens, depriving them of their property by force or fraud, disturbing the peace and quiet of whole communities, and inflaming the animosity of the races, and, in a word, fully carrying out the purposes and interests of their organization. To use the governor's own language, the Legislature, in the passage of this act, has conferred "upon the executive such powers as will enable him in any emergency to act with authority of law."

In response to the suggestion made by the governor in regard to martial law, the twenty-sixth section of the act we are considering provided: "It shall be the duty of the governor, and he is hereby authorized, whenever in his opinion the enforcement of the law of this State is obstructed within any county or counties by combination of lawless men too strong for the control of the civil authorities, to declare such county or counties under martial law, and to suspend the laws therein until the Legislature shall convene and take such action as it may deem necessary."

Not content with the military force already provided and the extraordinary powers conferred on the governor, the Legislature, on the 1st day of July, 1870, passed an act entitled "An act to establish a State police and provide for the regulation and government of the same."

By the terms of this act the force was composed of one chief of police, four captains, eight lieutenants, twenty sergeants, and two hundred and twenty-five privates. In addition to the above force, the act provides that "all sheriffs and their deputies, constables, marshals of cities and towns and their deputies, and police of cities and towns shall be considered as a part of the State police, and be subject to the supervisory control of the governor and chief of State police, and under directions of the governor or chief of State police may at any time be called upon to act in concert with the State police in preserving or suppressing crime, or in bringing to justice offenders. The chief of State police, subject to the governor, may make all needful regulations and rules for the maintenance and direction of these officers in matters looking to the maintenance of public peace, preventing or suppressing crime, and bringing to justice offenders, and any of these officers failing or refusing prompt obedience to such rules or regulations, or to the orders of the governor, or chief of State police, shall be removed from office and suffer such other punishment as may be prescribed by law."

This was an extraordinary power to confer upon the governor. It gave him control of all the civil executive officers of the State, and subjected them to removal from office if they failed or refused prompt obedience to the rules and regulations of the State police, or to the orders of the governor or chief of State police. The governor had asked the Legislature "to confer on him such powers as would enable him in any emergency to act with authority of law." In this act his request was literally complied with, and his pleasure or will made the paramount law of the State. The law creating the State police was amended so as to enable the governor to appoint an additional force of twenty men in each county, the expense of which was to be borne by the people of the respective counties. This additional force, like the others, was made subject to the order of the governor, and could be used by him at his pleasure. Was ever king, prince, or potentate clothed with greater power?

The Davis administration was the result of the methods adopted by the authorities of the United States, who were in control of the State during reconstruction. It was the legitimate child of arbitrary power and the continuation of despotic government in its very worst form. This was soon made manifest to the people of Texas. Terrible as had been the oppression of the people by the military authorities of the Federal Government, it was now even worse. Men, if possible, more infamous and of less responsibility were in a position to injure and harass the people. Not unfrequently they availed themselves of their official position to wreak vengeance upon those who had incurred their personal animosity.

The State police were a terror to every community, and in the name and by the authority of the State they perpetrated crimes of every description. They searched every place or seized any person or thing, and without probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation. The governor held that the uniform which was worn by the State guard and State police, together with their silver badge of office, supplied the place of affidavits and warrants, and authorized persons wearing the same to search any place or to seize any person or thing.

In the month of December, 1870, one Lieutenant Pritchett, at the head of three white and four negro police, went to the house of Col. James J. Gathings, in Hill County, and by force entered the same and searched it, against the protest of the proprietor. This was done without any authority of law, and no charge of any kind had been preferred against Colonel Gathings or any of his family. After they had left the house, Gathings went to the nearest magistrate and made affidavit to the facts, upon which the magistrate issued his warrant for the arrest of the parties offending. Lieutenant Pritchett and his party were arrested and gave bond for their appearance at a certain day before the magistrate, and forfeited the same; and instead of appearing before the magistrate Pritchett went to Austin, the capital of the State, and reported to the governor. Instead of sending Pritchett back to stand his trial, the governor placed about one hundred State guards under General Davidson, the chief of State police, and ordered him to proceed with all speed to Hill County.

Upon the arrival of Davidson and his force in Hill County he arrested Colonel Gathings and placed him in the court-house, from which all citizens were excluded, and a heavy guard stationed around it. General Davidson informed Colonel Gathings that no military commission would be convened to try him if he would pay the expenses of the force, which he estimated at $500 per day. Upon Colonel Gathings' refusal to comply with this demand, Davidson informed him that he would declare the county under martial law, tax the county to support the troops, organize a court-martial, and try him, and if convicted send him immediately to the penitentiary without the right of appeal. After this Davidson proposed to Gathings to settle the matter for $3,000. Colonel Gathings, with the assistance of some friends, paid the money.

The seventh section of article 1 of the constitution then in force reads as follows, namely:

"The people shall be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and possessions from all unreasonable seizures or searches, and no warrant to search any place, or to seize any person or thing, shall issue without describing such place, person, or thing, as near as they may be, nor without probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation."

Davis had taken his solemn oath to support this and every other provision of the constitution, but under the authority granted him by the Legislature he deliberately violated it, not only in the case of Colonel Gathings, but in hundreds of other instances.

A narration of the crimes and outrages committed by Governor Davis and his minions would fill a volume. There was an election for members of Congress in Texas, in the month of October, 1871, and in August prior to this election Governor Davis issued a proclamation to the people of Texas, which, as a manifestation of despotic authority and for brazen impudence, is without a parallel in the history of this, and perhaps of any other State in the Union. The proclamation reads as follows:

"All persons coming to vote shall deposit their votes with the least possible delay, and after this is done they are forbidden, under any pretext, to remain about the polls, or at the county seat, unless this is their residence, during the time of election, but shall return to their houses and usual employment, and peace officers, State guards, or militia on duty at the polls shall see that this regulation is complied with."

The constitution expressly prohibits the arrest of electors during their attendance at elections, and in going to and returning from the same, except in case of treason, felony, or breach of the peace.

But what cared Davis and his followers for the constitution? Undoubtedly it was his purpose to place at the polls such an array of peace officers, State guards, and State police as would deter many Democrats from voting; but in this he did not succeed. In the Third Congressional district, W. T. Clark was the Republican candidate for Congress, and D. C. Giddings was his Democratic opponent. Governor Davis canvassed the district in behalf of Clark, and his speeches were filled with vituperation and abuse of those who differed from him in politics, and were well calculated to create trouble. Every kind of device was resorted to, to inveigle Democrats into the commission of some act by which they could be placed in a false and disloyal attitude.

The writer remembers to have seen a number of United States flags suspended across a street and hung so low that a man of ordinary height could not walk under them without coming in contact with them, and it was well understood that they were thus suspended with the hope that some indiscreet person would tear one or more of them down, so that it might be flashed over the wires that in Texas the flag of the Union had been desecrated and trampled under foot. But the plan did not succeed, and the flags remained unmolested.

At one time Davis placed Walker County under martial law, and to defray the expenses of the military force that he quartered upon the county he compelled the people thereof to pay not less than $2,000. Afterwards he placed Limestone and Freestone Counties under martial law for no other purpose than to keep the vote of those counties from being counted for Giddings, the Democratic candidate for Congress. The people of Limestone County were compelled to pay a sum of $35,000, the amount of a tax that was levied upon them by a military order issued by one General A. G. Maloy, who styled himself "commander of the State forces in Limestone County."

The Legislature conferred upon the governor the power to appoint a mayor and other officers for each incorporated city or town in the State. Under this authority Davis placed "carpet-baggers," and others of his political faith, in control of the municipal governments, in a number of cities in the State, and many of these appointees reaped fortunes from their crookedness in office.

Their usual plan was to place a bonded debt upon the city or town, for which but little if any consideration was received by the inhabitants thereof; but the mayor and aldermen became rich, and the people were burdened with increased taxation.

In one city of not more than ten or twelve thousand inhabitants they created a debt of one and one-half millions of dollars, and the improvements for which this debt was incurred could have been obtained for much less than one-third of the amount stated. The bonds generally carried a high rate of interest, and all deficiencies in the payment of matured interest were met by the issuance and sale of new bonds, and thus from time to time were the burdens of the people increased.

Under the administration of Governor Throckmorton the rate of State taxation was 15 cents on the hundred dollars, and the taxes levied by the counties were correspondingly low, but were found to be amply sufficient for governmental purposes. The State was then practically out of debt and had a balance in the treasury.

Whatever wrongs had been perpetrated by the military authorities of the United States during the reconstruction period, they had not robbed the treasury or imposed onerous taxation upon the people. This was reserved for the Davis administration. From 1870 to 1874, the period covered by the administration of Governor Davis, the State ad valorem tax alone was 50 cents on the hundred dollars, and this was augmented by special State and county taxes to an amount unparalleled in the previous or subsequent history of Texas.

Governor Davis in his message to the Legislature, speaking of the State debt, said there was due the school fund $82,168.82, and due the university fund $134,472.26, and the only other indebtedness was that of the 10 per cent. warrants. This amount, he stated, was not considerable, and further said: "Texas may therefore substantially be said to be out of debt." This was a frank but true admission made by the governor of the financial condition of the State when he and his party came into power.

On December 1, 1873, the comptroller in the Davis administration, Mr. A. Bledsoe, in his report to the governor, gives the State debt at that date at $1,797,864.16. And when his administration closed he left as a legacy to the people of Texas a debt that amounted to $4,414,095.45.

During the administration of Governor Davis warrants upon the State treasury were hawked on the markets at 45 cents on the dollar and the bonds of the State were practically valueless in the home and foreign markets. The Davis administration made large promises in regard to the education of the youth of the State and fulfilled them by the creation of a cumbersome system of public schools, in which a vast retinue of officers absorbed the money appropriated for school purposes so rapidly as to prevent the schools from being taught a sufficient length of time to do any good. The children of the State, and especially the colored children, were growing up in ignorance, values were not appreciating, population was but slowly increasing, the State was rapidly becoming bankrupt, and the ruthless exercise of arbitrary power had rendered life, liberty, and property insecure.

Such were the results of an administration of public affairs that had been forced upon the people of Texas by those who had been placed in charge of reconstruction. But the day of deliverance was at hand. At the next general election the people swept Davis and his party from power and elected for State officers the entire Democratic ticket. In both houses of the Legislature a large majority of Democrats was elected. Richard Coke was elected governor, and, notwithstanding the immense majority of votes he had received, Davis would have resisted his induction into office if he could have been sustained in such action by the General Government. He vainly appealed to General Grant, who was then President of the United States, to assist him in his proposed usurpation of power, but General Grant refused to give him aid, and Coke was inaugurated and duly installed as governor of the State.

The Democratic party has had continuous control of public affairs in Texas since the defeat of Davis, and now, after fifteen years of Democratic government, we can speak with certainty of its results.

The Democratic Legislature elected with Governor Coke immediately repealed the odious laws passed during the Davis administration, and the people felt that they were once more free. State guards and State police, martial law and military despotism have become things of the past, and it is sincerely hoped will never be visited upon the people of Texas again. The credit of the State has been restored. Within a few months after the inauguration of Governor Coke the securities of the State commanded from 90 to 95 cents on Wall street, and afterwards sold for $1.40, and at this time rate as high as do the securities of any State in the Union.

The bonded debt of the State is now $4,237,730, which is all owned by special funds of the State except $1,220,530. Taxation has been largely reduced. The ad valorem revenue tax is 10 cents on the $100, and the tax for the support of the public schools is 12½ cents on the $100, and the average rate of county tax is 47 cents on the $100. These taxes are found to be amply sufficient to meet the expenses of State and county government.

Good government has not been without its influence in attracting immigration. The census reports show that the population of Texas in 1870 was 818,579, that it had increased in 1880 to 1,591,749, and there is little doubt but what Texas will have in 1890 a population of not less than 3,000,000.

Not only immigration, but with it capital, was attracted to our State and sought investment; and enterprise and industry have met their just reward. Great progress has been made in the building of railroads. In 1870 there was in operation in Texas only 711 miles of railway. In 1888 there had been constructed and was in operation 8,190 miles, and now there can not be much less than 9,000 miles of railroad in operation in this State.

Public education has not been neglected, but it has been fostered and largely developed. Normal schools for the training of teachers, both white and colored, have been established. A State university richly endowed has been founded, and is now in successful operation; and the agricultural and mechanical college of the State has been in a prosperous condition for a number of years.

When Texas was annexed to and became a part of the United States she reserved her public domain and long before the war between the States a large portion of it was set apart for the maintenance of free schools.

A part of these lands have been sold, and the proceeds applied to the public-school fund; but there yet remains about 28,000,000 acres belonging to the public schools. The permanent school fund now holds bonds amounting to $6,334,597, and interest-bearing notes given in payment for school lands, and secured by liens upon said lands aggregating $10,390,000, the annual interest on which, together with the money derived from land leases, amounted last year to the sum of $1,010,418.58. And this amount will annually increase for years to come.

In addition to the lands belonging to the State, each county in the State owns 17,712 acres of land, the proceeds of which are to be applied exclusively to the support of common schools.

For the further aid of free schools a tax of 12½ cents on the $100 worth of property and a poll tax of $1 on every male inhabitant of the State between the ages of twenty-one and sixty years are set apart for their support, and each community has the option of supplementing the State funds by local taxation. Texas annually expends about $2,778,000 for the support of public free schools. Notwithstanding the negroes own but little property and pay scarcely any taxes—not even a poll-tax—and the burden of sustaining the free schools is borne by the white population almost exclusively, yet in the disbursement of the school funds no discrimination is made against colored children, but they and the white children fare alike.

Complete reports were not made to the superintendent of public education of the State from all the counties last year, but from what were made we learn that during the year 864,744 children between the ages of eight and sixteen attended the free schools, of which number 280,261 were white and 58,463 were colored children. Considering the respective number of whites and blacks in the State, this is a good showing for the colored people.

During the administration of E. J. Davis the taxes levied for the support of free schools for one year were many times greater than the annual tax levied by the State under Democratic rule, and more school-houses are now built each year than were built during the entire period of the Davis administration, while the schools are incomparably better.

The white people of Texas believe that the best remedy for all the evils which may flow from "universal suffrage" is "universal education," and in the interests of good government they have thought proper to give the colored people the advantage of a common-school education with the hope that it may help to qualify them for the discharge of the duties incumbent upon American citizens.

In Texas the relations between white and colored people have always been amicable and peaceable. In a few localities in the State disturbances have occurred, but there has been no serious conflict between the white and colored races, nor is any such conflict apprehended. With the exception of the Washington County case, before the Senate of the United States at its last session (and which was not sustained by evidence), it has never been charged that in Texas colored men have been prevented from voting as they pleased; nor has it been alleged that their votes were not properly counted.

Texas has entered upon an era of unexampled prosperity. Her delightful climate, which permits out-door work in every month of the year, and her cheap and productive lands, together with light taxation and exceptional educational institutions, have attracted white immigrants from every State in the Union, as well as from Europe, and this immigration is increasing so rapidly that with us the negro will soon fail to excite solicitude upon the part of any political party. What we want in Texas is to be let alone by the Federal Government and be allowed to manage our local affairs.

Our people earnestly hope that no policy will be adopted by the present or any future Administration of the Federal Government that does not embrace within its scope the whole country.

We have had enough of a "Southern policy" during the "reconstruction period," the evils of which, at least to some extent, I have endeavored to describe in this paper. We trust that the people of no section of the United States will ever again be willing to see a government of any of the States in this Union established by the people thereof supplanted by a military despotism.

CHAS. STEWART.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to hear from the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. STEWART, of Texas] his glowing account of the State of Texas. Especially am I glad to hear of the advances made there in education. And I can assure the honorable gentleman that if they will educate the people of Texas, white and black, the time is not far distant when the 165,000 Democratic majority will be very materially cut down. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. SPRINGER. The more they are educated the larger the Democratic majority is getting.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to announce that the galleries must abstain from applause.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, in my judgment the importance of the subject under consideration is paramount to any question before the Fifty-first Congress. In comparison, "tariff for protection" or "tariff for revenue only" is insignificant; the financial question of gold or silver standard of value is of minor importance. The policy of reciprocity with the South American republics or with Canada has but little interest in the minds of the people when a measure so vigorous in preserving the rights of the citizen is before Congress for discussion and action.

Every citizen recognizes that the purity of the ballot-box is essential to the preservation of a republican government. Where the ballot is tainted and stained with fraud, intimidation, and corruption, the result does not command the confidence and respect of the people. It is not an expression of their will, and whenever the people without protest submit to the decision of a corrupt ballot-box, whenever the voice of the majority is silenced by violence, murder, and fraud, the day is not far distant when the liberties of the people will be subverted, the safety and sacredness of their property and homes will be endangered. The dishonest public official may rob the Treasury, a reckless financial policy may empty the full vaults of the nation, a disastrous war may sweep our commerce from the seas, destroy our cities, and fill our land with the bloody tokens of battle, yet with our matchless resources we could again fill our Treasury, rebuild our cities, and make the homes of our citizens glad with returning prosperity. But destroy the confidence of our people in the ballot-box as an expression of the will of the majority, and you sow the seeds of discord that will ripen and grow into the harvest of revolution and anarchy.

Therefore the proposition to be determined is, have the people been prevented from having a fair ballot and an honest count to such an extent as to misrepresent their views in the halls of legislation and defeat their choice in the men selected to fill the offices of the nation?

If so, is the bill under consideration the proper remedy? In answer to the first proposition I will not marshal in detail the evidence. Almost every Northern State, through its Legislature, has recognized the fact that in the larger cities the purity of the ballot-box has been outraged in the most shameful manner. Corruption and fraud with unblinking arrogance have surrounded the polls with hoodlars, and votes have been bought and sold in open market, and, if that was not sufficient to accomplish the desired result, the returns have been changed and falsified. Tickets have been switched and ballot-boxes stuffed. Even the crime against the suffrage of the people extended to the smaller cities and villages until the strong arm of the law has been invoked by placing more stringent regulations and new safeguards around the ballot-box. In the Southern States we had first the Ku Klux and the shotgun policy. Murder stained with blood the ballots of the colored citizens of the South; a reign of terror was inaugurated; but of later years the shotgun has been supplanted by the more quiet yet effective measures of fraud fully described in the evidence that has been filed year after year in the contested-election cases before this House. I need not enter into details. In private conversation with members of Congress from the South there are no denials of the facts stated, but they justify it by the local conditions that exist since the abolishment of slavery in the Southern States. Therefore I leave to others to collect the disgraceful evidence which shows that in the North and the South the purity of the ballot-box has been outraged.

This brings me to the second proposition, is the bill under consideration the proper remedy? My answer in brief would be, it is not strong enough, but it is a step in the right direction, and, if enacted into a law, in the light of future experience its defects can be amended.

Have we the right to enact such a law? In answer I refer to section 4, Article I, of the Constitution of the United States, which reads as follows:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations except as to the places of choosing Senators.

This, with the decisions of the Supreme Court in the cases of Ex parte Siebold and Ex parte Yarborough, settles the right of Congress to control and regulate so definitely and clearly as to be beyond intelligent controversy. At least in the brief time allotted to me I will not further discuss this proposition.

The bill under consideration is supervisory in its provisions, costly in its enforcement, and uncertain in its results. But we, as Republican members of Congress, would be derelict in our duty to our constituents if we failed to place upon the statute-book additional safeguards around the sacred right of suffrage. Without hesitation I admit that the Legislatures of the Northern States, without regard to party lines, will be compelled by the force of public opinion to throw around the ballot-box the protection of more stringent legislation in the interest of an honest ballot and an honest count, and there the strong arm of the National Government is not required to preserve the purity of the ballot-box; but in the light of the experience of the last twenty-five years, can the people of this nation believe there is a determination to have an honest ballot in the States where slavery existed in 1861?

This leads to the discussion of a problem that is the heritage of the late rebellion, a problem that twenty-five years of experience has left unsolved. I believe its true solution will be found only after the prejudices of sectionalism have been absorbed in the love of one country and one flag, when the men of the North and the men of the South unite in the sentiment that this nation is greater than the State, when the heresy of State rights is buried beneath the lofty column of a patriotism that recognizes the National Government as supreme. Then the united statesmanship of the North and South will settle the race problem by the algebra of eternal justice.

Mr. TURNER, of New York. And this bill represents x, an unknown quantity.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Ohio. The "unknown quantity" will be found when the bill is put in force; it will be found in the Republican members that will be elected from Southern districts and in an honest ballot in the city and State of New York.

Mr. TURNER, of New York. Yes, and this bill is urged for the sake of getting more Republican members. It indicates not the love of the negro, but the "itching palm" that grasps for more political power.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Ohio. It is an effort to secure an honest ballot, a ballot that has been outraged in the city of New York, a ballot that has been outraged in every Southern State.

Mr. TURNER, of New York. And a ballot that has been outraged in Pennsylvania. The love of the Republican party for the purity of the ballot sounds like the profession of the harlot when she prates of virtue.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Ohio. I have stated that faults exist both North and South, but you, as an American citizen, as a lover of your country, ought gladly to come to the rescue to preserve the ballot untrammelled and untainted by fraud.

Mr. TURNER, of New York. And put elections in the hands of two Republican inspectors and one Democrat. If you are honest why do you not divide your inspectors equally?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Ohio. It makes no difference in whose hands it is put—

Mr. TURNER, of New York. Oh, yes, it does.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Ohio. You will know nothing of the enforcement of this law in your State unless your citizens require it for their protection. No honest man and no honest party need fear the enforcement of this law.

Mr. TURNER, of New York. You mean no honest man and no honest party will call for it.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Ohio. I approach this question with the frank admission that I look at it with the eyes of a soldier of the Union Army, anxious to secure what I believe to be the legitimate results of the late war, not with the desire to humiliate the proud people of the South. My father was born in Virginia, my mother was born and reared to womanhood in the shadow of the Natural Bridge, my wife was born in Texas, and my children were born in Tennessee—

Mr. COWLES. I desire to ask the gentleman when he expects to have a reunion of that family? [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Ohio. We have the reunion and a practical reconstruction.

Mr. COWLES. I want to attend that reunion.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Ohio. Come; a few lessons in loyalty will do you good.

Therefore by the ties of ancestral blood and domestic affection I am bound to the people of the South in a bond of sympathy that would prevent me from doing them intentional injustice. I honor their bravery, I admire but deplore the determined struggle their statesmen have made for the last twenty-five years to regain in the halls of Congress what they lost on the field of battle. But as an American citizen I believe the time has come when in the election for President and members of Congress the elector, white or black, shall be protected by the strong arm of the National Government in securing a free ballot and in having an honest count. I will not here discuss whether the nation was wise in giving negroes the right of suffrage, but "in the swirl of the battle's fierce flame" the shackles that made them slaves were melted, and Article XV of the Constitution placed in their hands the ballot and clothed them in the sacred mantle of American citizenship, and I believe it to be our duty to protect them in exercising the right to vote for the candidate of their choice without question and without restraint.

Mr. Speaker, there has been much said about a "new South," when the people of that section will forget the prejudices of the present and the past; when the war will be remembered as God's punishment for the injustice of this nation towards the negro race; when the brave deeds of the Union and Confederate soldiers will be remembered only as the history of American valor; when the fertile fields of the South will yield their fatness and the rich ore of their mountains will be uncovered by the brown hands of well paid labor; when the manufactures that enrich the people of the New England States will be rivaled and excelled in the valleys of the South. Bright as the future of the South is thus outlined, I believe it can be realized.

But the first step towards that era of prosperity must be the disintegration of that political monstrosity called the "solid South," made solid by fraud and force, made solid by preventing a free ballot and an honest count. There is force in the statement that a free ballot in many portions of the South means negro domination, out of which will grow the election of corrupt men to office, and that the public Treasury will be robbed by unprincipled white men elected by ignorant black men, and that an era of corruption so vividly described by the eloquent gentleman from South Carolina will exist. But I believe that the negro voters of the South have improved in intelligence and have learned that honest administration of the laws is as important for the colored race as it is for the white race. I further believe that free and open discussion of political measures would be in any portion of the South an education to both races.

I have a faint suspicion that the fear of a corrupt administration of the laws in the South under a free ballot is not the true reason that controls the white race. Corrupt men are now elected in the South. Has the gentleman forgotten the defalcation of Marshall Polk, of Tennessee, who purloined from the treasury $385,000; of E. A. Burke, of Louisiana, who stole $500,000; of honest Dick Tate, of Kentucky, who embezzled $200,000; of Archer, of Maryland, who is short $200,000? These are recent events, occurring under Democratic administrations, and the defaulting officers were not of the "picked villains of the North," but came from the ranks of the first families of the chivalry of the South.

Mr. BOATNER. None of those men, however, have been elected United States Senators or nominated as governors of States.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Ohio. They may not have been, but God knows what might have happened if they had not loved money too well and gotten away with it.

Mr. BOATNER. They are in the penitentiaries.

Mr. ENLOE rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIAMS] yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Ohio. Yes, sir; I will yield to my friend from Tennessee if he wants to state his experience.

Mr. ENLOE. I believe the gentleman has said that at one time he lived in Tennessee.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Ohio. Yes, sir.

Mr. ENLOE. And when you lived down there, your party stole by the million.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Ohio. No, sir; I deny that.

Mr. ENLOE. We sent our thieves to the penitentiary; but you sent yours to the Legislature and to Congress.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Ohio. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] says that there have been no United States Senators—

Mr. HOUK (to Mr. ENLOE). The only stealing done under Republican administration was by an Andrew Johnson Democrat.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Ohio. Yes, sir; by a man named Rutter.

Mr. ENLOE. I had no reference to my colleague [Mr. HOUK]. They sent him here before they stopped stealing, and they have kept it up ever since.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Ohio. In reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER], that there have been no United States Senators elected from the South who stole money, I ask where are the $2,500,000 of the school fund of Tennessee, that sacred school fund that was carried out of the State by ISHAM G. HARRIS?

Mr. ENLOE. It was brought back and was stolen by your party after it got into power, and on top of it they added $20,000,000 to the State debt.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Ohio. The little that we got back after the war was covered into the Treasury; but what became of the balance? It went to dismember the Union, to destroy the nation. And yet gentlemen talk to me about the honest chivalry of the South.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Ohio. I ask two or three minutes longer.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman from Ohio was interrupted without his permission and without the Chair being addressed. I raise the question whether his time has expired by any fair interpretation of the rules.

Mr. ENLOE. I hope the gentleman from Michigan does not apply his remarks to me.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. No; the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] had permission, as I understand. I am not finding fault with anybody who interrupted the gentleman from Ohio; I simply ask an interpretation of the rule. I insist that a gentleman when occupying the floor has a right to speak without being interrupted.

Mr. SKINNER. I hope the gentleman's time will be extended. He stated in the first part of his remarks that this bill was not strong enough. I want to hear him outline a bill that he thinks is strong enough. He ought to have time enough to do it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that he tries to make allowance for interruptions, but it is impossible for the Chair to preserve order on the floor or make proper allowance for such interruptions unless the party interrupting first addresses the Chair and gets permission from the gentleman occupying the floor.

Mr. FRANK. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to proceed for two or three minutes longer.

Mr. GOODNIGHT. I shall object unless the time be charged to the other side of the House.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. But gentlemen on that side occupied the time.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Ohio. Charge it wherever you please if you give me the time.

Mr. GOODNIGHT. I do not withdraw my objection unless with that understanding.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That will be the understanding.

Mr. GOODNIGHT. But I thought the gentleman from Michigan had objected.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I thought my friends on the other side had expressed regret for having occupied the time of the gentleman from Ohio and were willing to give him additional time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the gentleman will proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Ohio. I thank the House for its courtesy and will endeavor to be brief in my remarks.

Besides, there is nothing in the measure under discussion that will prevent the State government and the people of the South from throwing around a free ballot such restrictions as wise statesmanship would suggest as best for the local self-government of the South. But we do insist that in electing members of Congress the colored man's ballot shall express his sentiments. A member of Congress elected from the South legislates not for his section, but for the nation, and if he holds his seat by fraud and violence the outrage is not local, but national, and is felt in Ohio as well as in South Carolina. Gentlemen object to the bill because its provisions have a tendency to centralize the government of the people in the hands of the United States officials. I admit that such is the fact. I believe in a strong National Government. One of the lessons of the late war taught the people of the South that this Union was not a rope of sand held together at the will of the States, but that it is an adamant chain held together by the voice and vote of the citizens of a nation, by a people who are determined, if it is necessary to preserve one country and one flag, to wipe out every vestige of State rights and relegate the doctrine of State sovereignty to the traditions of the past.

The Republican party is a bold, progressive party; it takes no step backward; its march is always forward. We believe that "taxation and representation go hand in hand;" that taxation without representation is the creed of tyrants and the gospel of absolute monarchy.

We believe in a strong Government, one able to protect its citizens from wrong and oppression in a foreign land and also in the humble cabin of the negro of the South. We believe in a law that is so far-reaching that the most powerful and proudest citizen is not above its influence and that the poorest, feeblest citizen in the nation can safely rest beneath its protecting power. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Therefore, in answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SKINNER] as to what I would consider a stronger bill, I answer, a national election law, plain, explicit, and well guarded, with heavy penalties for violation incorporated therein, for the election of President, Vice-President, and members of Congress.

The loyal people of the nation demand that the certificate held by members of Congress shall be untainted by fraud and violence and be the honest expression of the majority of the voters of each Congressional district. They have waited patiently for the evidence of honest elections in the South. Their hearts have grown sick and tired of the continuous tale of fraud and violence that meets each succeeding Congress on the threshold of the Capitol, and I state it as my deliberate judgment that unless we have an honest ballot and an honest count the day is not far distant when a "Federal election law," and not an extension of the supervisory system already on the statute-book, will be enacted and enforced. We are told that the bill under consideration if enacted into law will be resisted, that it will engender party strife and awaken race prejudices. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. EWART] says:

Give the negro of the South salutary neglect.

Mr. Speaker, it is "the old story," "let us alone." We heard it when eleven Southern States seceded from the Union; we heard it all through the war; we heard it when the Ku Klux Klan were disgracing the civilization of this Republic with their dastardly and cowardly deeds of violence and murder, and we hear it now twenty-five years after the war, when we ask that the poor whites and the negroes of the South be allowed to cast a free ballot and have that ballot honestly counted.

The enfranchisement of the negroes of the South has added thirty-eight members of Congress to the quota due the South under the law of apportionment. The Democratic "solid South" appropriates the thirty-eight members of Congress and asks the nation to treat this monstrous crime against free suffrage with "salutary neglect."

The Republican party demand that the citizens of the nation everywhere under the flag shall be protected in all the rights guaranteed to them under the Constitution. I have here a table of figures illustrating the result of "salutary neglect" in five States of the South, which I desire to print in the RECORD.

In the following-named States the census of 1880 showed a colored majority in twenty-six Congressional districts, as follows:

[Mr. STOCKDALE addressed the House. His remarks are withheld for revision. See Appendix.]

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I will say in regard to the remarks made by the gentleman from Mississippi that I do not think he has heard anything said by any man on this side of the House in derogation of Southern soldiers or of Southern people. We only ask that a bill which is to give protection to every citizen at the ballot-box shall be passed. The object of this bill is to secure to every man in the Southern States the right to vote according to his convictions of public duty, and to have that vote counted according to his will. Now, this is all that this bill proposes. Is there anything wrong in that? It is to be applied to the North as well as to the South, and it is only to be applied anywhere in case one hundred citizens make the statement that they believe it is necessary to secure a fair election.

Mr. SAYERS. Fifty in a Congressional district.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. And one hundred in certain other cases.

Mr. SAYERS. Well, fifty in a Congressional district.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. Fifty in a city or one hundred in a Congressional district.

Mr. SAYERS. Do you not think that you could find fifty men in any Congressional district, if they are to be appointed deputy United States marshals or supervisors, who will make the application?

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. I do not think you could. I certainly have no feeling in this matter, and the only object is to secure a fair vote in this country.

Mr. McRAE. Why do you not have it in your Congressional district to get a fair vote?

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. We will not ask for it.

This bill should be considered dispassionately, with the aid of the best lights within our reach, weighing carefully the facts and the constitutional authority and precedent warranting action.

Lofty declamation and passionate invective have been invoked against the passage of the bill, but these will not silence the demand for a free ballot and a fair count in every part of this country.

Every invasion of the rights of the humblest citizen in matters relating to the suffrage is a menace to free government. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] quoted the author of the Declaration of Independence to repeat his forebodings about the dangers to free governments from the encroachments of the Federal judiciary during the Administration of Mr. Monroe.

It would be a fortunate thing for the country if gentlemen were as free to quote Jefferson in regard to the unalienable rights of man to life and liberty, and "that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed."

No man did more in his day and generation than Mr. Jefferson to dignify the sacred right of the citizen to share in the Government by means of the ballot without regard to wealth or social position.

Of course it would be better if the local authorities would concede and secure the right of suffrage, but if they fail the Constitution has not left us without a remedy.

Frequent reference has already been made to the specific grant on this subject contained in the Constitution.

Section 4, Article I, provides—

That the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof, but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

The bill does not attempt to provide what shall be the qualifications of electors. It was originally provided that they should be the same as for the most numerous branch of the Legislature of the State, and this has been modified by the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution.

The Congress can therefore make new regulations or alter the regulations of the State already made in reference to elections of members of Congress, prescribing the time the elections shall be held, the places at which they shall be held, and the manner in which they shall be held. This very clearly covers the whole ground and leaves as the only question worthy of serious consideration the question whether there is occasion for the exercise of that power.

In addition to this, section 14, Article IV of the Constitution provides that the United States shall guaranty to every State of the Union a republican form of government. The term republican was defined by Jefferson many times, and I had occasion in the debate on the Wyoming constitution to quote from his letter to James Taylor, written May 28, 1816, in which he said:

On this view of the import of the term republic, instead of saying, as has been said, that it may mean anything or nothing, we may say that governments are more or less republican as they have more or less of the elements of popular election or control in their composition, and believing as I do that the mass of citizens is the safest depository of their own rights, and especially that the evils flowing from the duperies of the people are less injurious than those from the egotism of their agents.

James Madison, in the thirty-ninth number of The Federalist, defined the term "republic" as follows:

We may define a republic to be, or at least bestow that name on a government which derives all its power directly and indirectly from the great body of the people. It is essential to such government that it be derived from the great mass of society, not from a portion or a favored class.

These views of these honored statesmen may be considered as conclusive as to what constitutes a republican form of government within the meaning of the Constitution.

If by any means a State confines its suffrage to any portion of its people and excludes another, it is surely not republican in form, and the time to execute the guaranty has arrived and should be executed.

In some sections there is no pretense, even, that colored men are considered in the matter of the selection of officials or in determining public policies. They are counted in determining the political weight of the sections, and the Southern States have thirty-nine Representatives on this floor and in the electoral college based on the colored population of those States, and yet in this House they have no representation from many of those States and only a partial representation in others, and are misrepresented and opposed by over thirty Representatives which the States have by virtue of the existence of that population thus misrepresented.

We had the evidence, complete and uncontradicted, in the case of McDuffie vs. Turpin, that men who would not pledge themselves to deprive the colored voters of their just share of popular control were set aside as inefficient and unworthy of confidence.

The excuse for all of this is that—

First. Colored voters are illiterate and ignorant.

Second. That there is danger of negro supremacy.

Third. That property interests would be unsafe.

Ignorance in the voter is much less dangerous to society than organized and educated selfishness. Selfishness combined for oppression, as to retain class supremacy, has been the great foe of human freedom and human progress in all ages. Even ignorant men understand the necessity for just government and easily learn who are in favor of it. Many think there is not so much apprehension of colored supremacy as of Republican supremacy by the aid of negro and white Republican votes.

I was during the war and for some years previous a close student of the opposing forces, and of their motives of action, and when it closed, being stationed at Montgomery, Ala., the first capital of the Southern Confederacy, I was specially interested in the discussions that grew out of the war, and of the changed condition of affairs, resulting from the overthrow of slavery. The advocates of white supremacy were laying plans to get rid of that part of the colored population who had been soldiers in the Union Army.

The editor of the Montgomery Mail, which had been one of the ardent advocates of the secession movement, recommended that the colored soldiers to the number of 300,000 be sent to Mexico to drive out Maximilian with a view of getting rid of the danger of their presence in the United States. I addressed, on the 30th day of May, 1865, the following letter to the editor of that paper, which was published the next day on that printing paper which gentlemen on that side of the House will remember. I ask the Clerk to read a copy of that letter, which I send to the Clerk's desk:

Editor of the Mail:

Sir: In your paper you encourage free discussion. I therefore embrace the opportunity to present the views of a sincere friend of the whole country on the question of reconstruction, at present the most interesting to the Southern mind. The soldier has accomplished his mission in this struggle, and whether on the side of victors or vanquished, has displayed heroism to challenge the admiration of the world. Henceforth, we may assume, the statesman will control the destinies of the nation. This struggle has finally and forever settled two questions: First, that under the Constitution there is no right of secession; secondly, that all men henceforth must be regarded as free. Any reconstruction scheme must presuppose the settlement of these two questions in favor of the Government.

The action of the Government toward the seceded States will depend very much on the promptness with which the people adopt these views. If immediate measures are taken by the people to conform to the Constitution and laws of the General Government, the day of harmony is at hand. If they fail to do this the arts of the statesman will be exhausted to create an element that will conform to the new order of things, even if it should proceed so far as the enfranchisement of the freed negroes and investing the governing power in their hands. The Government does not always intend to have military governors and military force in the South, but law and order must be enforced, and if the white citizens fail to enforce the Constitution and the laws the loyal blacks will become the depositories of civil power. The question of the colonization of the negroes has been one of great interest to the people.

The Northern States especially have been pondering over the subject for years, and have arrived at the conclusion that forced colonization would be a crime unparalleled in atrocity in the history of human legislation, and while encouragement of voluntary deportation by legislation might not be criminal, it would certainly imply a disregard of the elements of political economy, and of leading rules of christianity. Now, when the ravages and desolations of war have taxed so heavily the industrial resources of the nation; when so much necessarily exists that the sad scars that mar the beauty of the fair face of the country should be obliterated; when 500,000 strong, industrious men have been taken from the country by the diseases of the camp, or the sword, it behooves the country to economize well all its physical resources.

The national authority has been vindicated by the triumph of the national arms, but the national credit must be sustained by the gradual payment of the public debt, and to do this the more speedily it is necessary that the public industry should be developed in every possible way. He, therefore, who at this hour would send away so large a portion of our producers would, to say the least, be a very doubtful political guide. Rather let our producers be increased in number, that the burden of the public debt may be the less; and by all means let there be no increase in the debt of the nation by engaging in other wars, unless it be for some vital principle. Many suppose that the Northern emigration will supply the demand for labor in the South. This will be found to be a mistake. True, there will be emigrants; but they will create greater demands than they will supply, at least for many years.

Indeed, we believe that in the South will arise the most determined opposition to colonization; for the fears that some entertain of social equality will soon pass away and then the question will be one of economy simply. Another reason why the South may be expected to oppose colonization is that she will not voluntarily relinquish her influence in Congress based on the representation of so large a class of her population, which she would do in the next apportionment by the deportation of free negroes. The Southern people would do well to weigh all these matters carefully, for ultimately they will undoubtedly regret that they have not in everything been influenced by logic rather than by passion and prejudice; and aside from this there is a great moral question involved. The negroes are ignorant; though free, they need training.

The South and the country can not, if they would, relieve themselves of the moral obligation they are under to prepare the negro for self-control; and doing this cheerfully the people will display their highest qualities and erect a monument to their memory more lasting than monumental brass in the perpetual gratitude of a degraded but rising race. Let the people of the South meet all these questions fearlessly, trusting something to the wisdom of the next generation, and we doubt not the result will be universal harmony and prosperity. If she resists further, and while abandoning the form, still cling to the spirit of slavery and secession, the success of the cause of law and order will not be less sure, but the South will yet have to continue in the valley of humiliation.

OCCASIONAL.

MONTGOMERY, May 30, 1865.

Gentlemen on that side of the House, and especially the gentleman from South Carolina, has alluded to the period of reconstruction in terms of such unmeasured denunciation that it requires temerity to avow amidst so much denunciation any sympathy with the policy of reconstruction. The letter just read predicted the adoption of those measures under certain contingencies. There were mercenary men in the reconstruction period there is no doubt; but the governments they formed then were the groundwork out of which has grown the present prosperity in those States.

Mr. SAYERS. There was not a government formed in the South in the reconstruction period in any State where the constitution has not been changed since that time.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. Some of them have been changed and some have not. I understand that the constitution of South Carolina has not been changed.

Mr. TILLMAN. The constitutions of all the conquered States except South Carolina and Mississippi have been changed, and Mississippi has called a constitutional convention.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. Well, there are Mississippi and South Carolina which have been living for fifteen years and which are still living under the constitutions formed by reconstruction.

Mr. TILLMAN. And, if the gentleman will permit me to say it, the constitution of South Carolina is most ill-adapted to her people and their condition.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. That may be the gentleman's view of it.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is the view of all our people, and that is one cause of the upheaval among them. They have determined to get rid of the abominable concern, and it has been their poverty, in part, that has prevented them from doing it at an earlier day.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. They found slave-State constitutions and slave codes, and wiped them out. They found laws making it a crime to educate a colored child, and they provided universal public education.

Those measures that then were denounced as unparalleled extravagance are now settled policy, as they claim.

I was not astonished at the defiant attitude of the gentleman from South Carolina. South Carolina was an old Federal State. She had very little, if any, sympathy with the views of Thomas Jefferson with reference to human rights. Her organization has always been aristocratic. She had a property qualification before the war. She elected her electors by the Legislature rather than by the people.

She time and again defied the national authority, and was the acknowledged leader in the war of the rebellion for the establishment of a slave Confederacy, and as a consequence the triumph of the Union and the restoration of the flag to the ramparts of Fort Sumter and the establishment of a republican government in that State was more humiliating to that State than to any other portion of the South.

Mr. HEMPHILL. The gentleman does not mean to say that I said that?

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. No; I will come to what you said. I am saying that I was not surprised at your remarks.

The gentleman voices that humiliation and gives strong expression to that feeling in saying that she was fleeced by the picked scoundrels of the United States. And yet he must admit that she was redeemed from that government by the Republican party and a man of the highest character was her last Republican governor.

He is master of the use of language, and he addresses us in the language of persuasion, but he concludes by saying, unless my argument is listened to and approved I fling full defiance in your face.

Mr. HEMPHILL. It is only just for the gentleman to give me an opportunity to say at this point that I made no such remark as that in any such application. I said there were people who would not listen to the truth, upon whom we could make no impression, and could not expect to make any, and that we defied them, and we do defy them.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. The gentleman repeats it. That is, unless we adopt his convictions as to what we ought to do or to accept, he defies us.

Mr. HEMPHILL. No, sir; not at all.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. Then the gentleman grows warm, and grows reckless, and with tragic manner and vehement speech declares we must rule or we must leave, and before God, I say it with reverence, we will not leave.

The gentleman inquires "are we not our fathers' sons?" We have had occasion before in our history to witness the defiant attitude of South Carolina. She has before thrown down the gauntlet. Formerly it was in the name of slavery and rebellion, and we reply are we not our fathers' sons? Are we not the men and the descendants of the men who grandly resolved that the Federal authority in all its vigor should be maintained on every part of the American soil for the protection of the citizen and for the preservation of the Union?

And we affirm, with all the solemnity of the gentleman from South Carolina, that if the votes of the colored Republicans of South Carolina joined with those of the white Republicans of that State make a majority of that Commonwealth, or of any Congressional district thereof, that verdict will be maintained. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HEMPHILL. I agree with you entirely about that.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. HEMPHILL. But I say the purpose of this bill is to take charge, not only of the Federal elections, but of the State elections also.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. Then you misunderstand it.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I do not misunderstand it. If you will give us a law which will operate equally in all parts of the United States, and apply to Federal elections only, we can stand as many bad laws as you can, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. KERR, of Iowa. I say to the gentleman, as was said by one of our great poets over a quarter of a century ago, in that forceful address of "Brother Jonathan to Sister Caroline":

You were always too ready to fire at a touch;
But we said, she is hasty; she does not mean much.
We have scowled when you uttered some turbulent threat
But friendship still whispered forgive and forget.
Oh, Caroline! Caroline! child of the sun!
There are battles with fate that can never be won.
The star-flowing banner must never be furled,
For its blossoms of light are the hope of the world.

[Applause.]

That flag is the emblem of popular government. It is the pride of the nation, the first utterance of which was the declaration of human political equality.

In view of the declaration of the gentleman, it would seem to be unnecessary to prove in this debate that the colored people of some portions of the South are denied the exercise of the rights guaranteed to them by the Constitution of our country, for the gentleman declares that they shall not rule. Nor is the gentleman alone in that determination. The gentleman speaks for South Carolina. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] is reported by a paper in his State as having expressed similar sentiments about Alabama. I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read the interview as reported in that paper, which has never been disavowed. It was printed in the RECORD of June 4 as a part of the speech of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. COMSTOCK]:

I think it is probable that he will try Hayes's policy on an enlarged and surer basis of giving the offices to protectionists and weak-kneed Democrats as a means of disintegrating the Democratic party and giving to the negro voters more respectable white leaders than they have had heretofore, and he will find some who are for sale. The number will depend very largely upon the social status which the earliest converts are allowed to retain. If no difference is made between them and Democrats in this respect the number will be much greater than if the old ostracism of the reconstruction era is maintained. But in any event, the number of birds caught in the Federal trap will not be great enough to break up the solid South unless the Republican heart of the negro can be fired so as to bring them to the polls and vote them solidly for the Republican party. This will be very difficult if not impossible of performance, for the reason that when the negroes flock to the polls to take control, race antagonism is aroused and the irrepressible white men will not submit to it.

Congress will, I believe, amend the laws so as to authorize supervisors of Federal elections to be appointed by Federal judges, with powers much enlarged above those they may now exercise for the purpose of encouraging the negroes to vote and to have their votes counted, and make any interference with the supervisors punishable by the Federal courts. We all know that nine-tenths of the negroes are Republicans, and that when they vote at all it will be, with few exceptions, the Republican ticket. They do this, not from convictions of duty or by process of reason, but from race prejudice. The stimulus which will make the negro an active partisan will invite a few more carpet-baggers into the South to be sacrificed as office-holders, but they will be less numerous than formerly, because the negroes themselves will want the offices. There will not be harmony in the camp. In some localities their domination may be submitted to, while in others there will be race conflicts and bloodshed.

The increased representation which the enfranchisement of the negro gives the Southern States in Congress and in the electoral college, all of which are Democratic, is the one sore spot in the Republican spine, and they will make desperate efforts to change it. These may have some effect upon Southern prosperity and progress—they will create an apprehension—a distrust which will be felt, but they will not stop our progress, because such a policy will prove a failure. These States are white men's governments, and white men will make and execute their laws without the dictation of negroes, Chinamen, Indians, or any other colored race of men.

The gentleman from Alabama is a man accustomed to weigh his words. He is acknowledged, as is also the gentleman from South Carolina, as among the ablest members of this House. We have had a very great number of election contests before this body in which charges of fraud, intimidation, and suppression of the votes have been established. One man who had been elected, as was claimed by his friends, to this body, Mr. Clayton, of Arkansas, lies cold and silent in death, shot by political assassins while attempting to prosecute men who had stolen ballot-boxes with a view to reverse the verdict of the people at the polls. Is it not about time that Congress should exercise the power conferred on it by the Constitution to supervise efficiently the election of members of this body? The power to control the entire subject, clearly granted, implies the right to exercise a less important supervision and to declare the result.

The situation is one of momentous importance. If we falter in our duty to the citizens of the country we will prove ourselves unworthy of our high trust. We failed in that duty once before, and the masses of people thought the party had abandoned its high duty and left it in disgust. Gentlemen on the other side have made a parade of their love of the colored race, and the faithful old black mammy has more than once been extolled as an object of devotion and admiration. Both the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] have pronounced appropriate eulogies over that faithful domestic.

If that good old soul patiently performed the double duty of raising her own children and those of her mistress, she certainly is entitled to their gratitude, if not to eulogiums for her nobility. It would show greater appreciation of the kindness of that faithful domestic to accord to her own sons the free exercise of the privileges accorded to them by the Constitution. Much has been said about the assumption of the power by the National Government to correct local wrongs. All of the gentlemen on the other side have grown eloquent on this feature of this case. We have seen this morning the pronouncements of the Democratic members of this House to the country against the strengthening of this law.

The reasons given for the entire abdication of the authority of the Government to protect the citizen and secure the suffrage are reasons that have been presented before by the same gentlemen against the national authority when the life of the nation was involved, namely, that it violated the rights of the States. Gentlemen affect great regard for the fathers of the Constitution; but Mr. Madison, in the forty-third article of The Federalist, in reference to local violence growing out of conflicts of parties, said:

It will be much better that the violence in such cases should be repressed by the superintending power than that the majority should be left to maintain their cause by a bloody and obstinate contest. The existence of a right to interpose will generally prevent the necessity of exerting it.

The same distinguished statesman said further, in the same article:

In cases where it may be doubtful on which side justice lies what better umpires could be desired by two violent factions flying to arms and tearing a State to pieces than the representatives of confederate States, not heated by the local flame? To the impartiality of judges they would unite the affection of friends. Happy would it be if such a remedy for its infirmities could be employed by all free Governments; if a project equally effectual could be established for the universal peace of mankind.

This expression of the opinion of Mr. Madison about the propriety of national intervention in cases of violence is worth a whole battalion of men whose motives seem to be wholly influenced by a desire to excite popular prejudice in order that they may profit by continued repression of the Republican votes of the South and yet still retain forty Representatives based on the colored population, to dictate the laws for the nation and misrepresent the popular will. Montesquieu said, in speaking of the advantages of a confederate republic, "that should a popular insurrection happen in one of the States, the others are able to quell it; should abuses creep into one part they are reformed by those that remain sound." In this hope we advocate the passage of this law. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DARGAN. Mr. Speaker, I am far, very far, from agreeing with many of the views expressed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who opened this debate. But for one thing, at least, he is entitled to the gratitude of this House and the country. He discussed the race question in the language and temper of a scholar and a gentleman. This marks progress. This opens, I hope, a new era in the discussion of this momentous question by Republican members of this House. However this may be, of this we may be sure, that until this question is considered with fairness and moderation there can be no possible solution of it.

Having said what I think candor demanded that I should say in regard to the spirit and temper of the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], I must express my great surprise at one or two of the statements and arguments to which he seemed to attach great weight. My limited time will not permit me to do more than refer to them very briefly.

The gentleman says, among other things:

The South comes to this Congress with the demand that measures should be taken to deport the negro population. That the proposition is impracticable does not deprive it of its significance. It is a confession of failure and a cry of despair.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to the gentleman from Massachusetts, I say this remarkable statement is utterly without foundation in fact. The South has never, directly or indirectly, made any demand for the deportation of the negro population. She has never done anything or said anything which could, by any unprejudiced person, be tortured into the semblance of such a demand.

Mr. WADDILL. I wish to ask the gentleman whether Senator BUTLER, of his own State, did not introduce such a measure into the Senate.

Mr. DARGAN. He did; and he and one other Senator are the only members of Congress in either branch who favor the proposition.

Mr. WADDILL. It has not been passed upon yet, I believe?

Mr. DARGAN. No, sir; it has not been passed upon, but I reiterate what I have said, that no man in either House of Congress except those two Senators favors the proposition.

On the contrary, it is well known in what may be called "Congressional circles" that of the Senators and Representatives from the South, all except three, at the outside, are strenuously opposed, not only to the deportation of the negro, but even to the agitation of that question. So much for this extraordinary and utterly unwarranted statement, which I will say, however, is fully as well founded as many other strange statements of well-meaning men and women who look at everything "Southern" through the distorted spectacles of bitter prejudice.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] adduces a long line of figures and numerous tables to show that the number of votes cast at the North for Representatives in Congress is much larger than the number of votes cast for the same number of Representatives at the South, and having established this fact to his own satisfaction he infers with great confidence that the negro vote is suppressed by fraud.

Now, the question may well be asked, how does he know they are suppressed by fraud? How does he know that the negroes of the South do not do habitually what white people often do at times at the North, at the South, and indeed everywhere where there is anything like universal suffrage, voluntarily refrain from voting?

Does he not know that one of the methods by which the whites control Southern elections is by persuading colored voters not to go to the polls? Is there any more fraud in persuading a man not to vote than there is in persuading him to vote a certain ticket? But beside all this, is the gentleman satisfied that people who have a vote will always, or even generally, cast that vote? Does he not know that wherever universal suffrage prevails there is always a large percentage of the voters who at any ordinary election do not take the trouble to vote, and would he undertake to say that the negro after twenty-five years of citizenship can not be persuaded not to vote? Is there such a fascination about voting; have men such a passion for voting that they will not only not fail to vote, but they can not be persuaded from doing so?

The gentleman is a reader of history, as well a writer of it, and he ought to know and does know that one of the evils complained of by many writers on government is the small estimate in which the right to vote is held wherever universal suffrage prevails, and the great neglect which voters are guilty of in this regard. Out of many authorities which might be cited on this point I quote only one. Sir Henry Main (Popular Government, page 30) after quoting from Sir James Stephen, says:

There is no doubt that in popular governments resting on a wide suffrage, either without an army or having little reason to fear it, the leader, whether or not he be cunning or eloquent, or well provided with commonplaces, will be the wire-puller. The process of cutting up political power into petty fragments has in him its most remarkable product. The morsels of power are so small that men if left to themselves would not care to employ them. In England they would be largely sold, if the law permitted it; in the United States they are extensively sold in spite of the law; and in France, and to a less extent in England, the number of "abstentions" shows the small value attributed to votes.

In corroboration of Sir Henry Main on this point, I beg to refer to Essays on Practical Politics, by Mr. Theodore Roosevelt, of New York, an able and justly distinguished member of the Republican party. My limited time prevents a further discussion of the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and I propose to examine another argument made by a still more prominent member of the Republican party.

Of the many reasons why this bill should not be passed, I know of none stronger than one or two suggested by Speaker REED in his celebrated Pittsburgh speech. That the distinguished Speaker was utterly unconscious that he was stating convincing reasons why this measure should not be adopted, in the very speech in which he was urging that it should be adopted, can not be doubted. But this only renders these suggestions the more worthy of consideration. In this well-known speech, delivered on the 26th day of April last, he uses the following language:

I have not, for years, been one of those who have talked about the South. For the last eight years no man has heard me, in the House or in the campaign, discourse upon either outrages, or wrongs, murders, or shootings, or hangings. My silence did not arise from any approval of murder, of terrorism, or of fraud at elections. It did not arise from any ignorance of facts or any doubts of the great wrongs which are perpetrated against government by these people. It arose from a conviction, deep-seated in my mind, that the remedy for these political wrongs could not come from politicians, but from the people. Until they were aroused any efforts of ours would utterly be in vain. In fact, politicians are only seventh-hour men. They are worthy of their penny, but they never bear the burden and heat of the day. If they cry aloud before their hour they only turn back the shadow on the dial.

It thus appears by his own showing that during eight long years of "outrages," and "wrongs," "murders," "shootings," and "hangings," the distinguished speaker did not "in this House," or "in the campaign," open his lips even in protest; and that this silence did not arise from any approval "of murder, or terrorism, or of fraud at elections," neither did it "arise from any ignorance of facts or any doubts of the great wrongs which are perpetrated against government by these people." But it arose from the "deep-seated conviction"

"that the remedy for these political wrongs could not come from politicians, but from the people."

"Until the people were aroused any efforts of the politicians would utterly be in vain; that, in fact, politicians are only seventh-hour men." "They are worthy of their penny, but they never bear the burden and heat of the day. If they cry aloud before their hour they turn back the shadow on the dial."

The doctrine here so strikingly presented by the distinguished Speaker is undoubtedly sound, political teaching. The people alone can redress political wrongs. The politicians are only the agents or instruments by or through whom the people enact their abiding sentiments or judgments into laws. Until the people are aroused, all actions of the politicians are indeed "utterly vain." If they are to be operative, if they are to influence character and conduct, human laws as well as divine ones must be "written not only on the statute-book, but also on the hearts and consciences of men." And history fully sustains the further statement so made by the Speaker, that if politicians "cry aloud before their hour they only turn back the shadow on the dial." Now, Mr. Speaker, how is it in regard to the bill under consideration? Are the people aroused? Do the people want this law?

Is there any demand for it from any part of the country? Is there any demand for it even from the Republican party? Is it not a notorious fact that a few extremists of the Republican party, led by the Speaker of the House, have for months past been trying by caucuses, by private conferences, and by newspaper and magazine articles to persuade the Republicans in the two branches of Congress to make this measure a party measure and enact it into law? What the state of the public mind was in regard to this question as late as the 26th day of April last, only two months ago, the Speaker himself leaves us in no doubt. In this same Pittsburgh speech he says:

What, then, is the remedy? I speak only for myself. What I say binds nobody but me, and not even me, if the Republican party prefers another policy; but, speaking for myself, it seems to me that the only wise course is to take into Federal hands the Federal elections.

Here, then, is the usually clear-headed Speaker saying in one breath that during eight years of "murders," "shootings," and "hangings" he proposed no remedy because he had a "deep-seated conviction" that the remedy "could not come from politicians, but from the people," and in the next breath proposing a very radical and dangerous remedy which he admits in express terms comes from nobody but himself, and is without the indorsement even of the party of which he is the leader. [Laughter.] Applying the principles he lays down to the facts which he admits, and the Speaker and his few coworkers in this scheme "to take into Federal hands Federal elections" are "politicians who cry aloud before their hour," and who therefore can only "turn back the shadow on the dial." In other words, they are, according to Speaker REED's own principles, engaged in work which must do harm and not good.

Speaker REED thinks it very illogical in the Southern people to deny the existence of frauds at elections and at the same time to justify the frauds. Is it less illogical for a politician to declare that for eight years he has proposed no remedy for these frauds, because he has a "deep-seated conviction" that "the remedy could not come from the politicians, but from the people," and in the same speech propose a remedy which he admits in express terms comes only from himself? But whatever may be thought of the Speaker's logic, his doctrine that a remedy for political wrongs, unsupported by public sentiment, is not only useless, but is pernicious, is sound. And, as already suggested, this bill, tried by the principles of its own author, in the light of facts which he admits, is utterly condemned. But Speaker REED, in this same Pittsburgh speech, makes another statement, or "prophecy," as he calls it, which is strangely inconsistent with his advocacy of this bill.

After speaking of this measure, recommending its adoption, and defending its constitutionality, he says:

It will put an end to all bickerings. The Southern States will then by themselves grapple with the problem of whether any State of a republic can permanently enshrine injustice. Freed from all right of interference, exceptional and advisory, from the North, within their own borders and within the limits of their own State rights, they will have what they have longed for, the power to work out their own peculiar problem themselves, and I venture to prophesy, as I sincerely entertain the hope, that the relief from outside pressure will break down the race issue, and as the Southern people divide, not on the color issue, but on the questions which make up sound politics and good government, then, as the Constitution of the United States and the principles of our American system always intended, the voter, whether white or black, will contribute his share to the government of all, and the hopes which were at the foundation of all our great sacrifices will be finally and completely fulfilled.

Here, indeed, is a most extraordinary utterance. Here is the Speaker of this House, a prominent Republican leader, and the originator of this bill, insisting upon taking "Federal elections into Federal hands;" insisting on a most vigorous application of "outside pressure" to the Southern problem; and at the same time saying in the plainest possible language that he bases his hopes of a peaceful and permanent solution of this problem upon the relief of the Southern people from "outside pressure." Now, sir, I call upon this House and the country to accept his principles and reject his measure. If his principles are correct, his bill must be wrong. The practice and the precept are hopelessly irreconcilable.

Mr. Speaker, the only possible hope of a successful solution of the race problem is in the absolute and unqualified relief of the South from outside pressure. Its successful solution will call into requisition the highest attributes of human nature, firmness, courage, self-control, patience, and the broadest and most generous humanity. If not interfered with, I firmly believe the South will by the exercise of these high qualities honorably and successfully solve this problem. But if in order "to vote its ignorance" the Republican party insists on having a Federal election law, no man can predict the end. Here, as elsewhere and everywhere, I say most emphatically that the colored people of the South ought to be treated not only with justice, but with the utmost liberality. I concur most fully with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that they did not come to this country by their own act, they were not freed by their own act, they were not made voters by their own act.

For all these things the white men of the country, North and South, are responsible. And I wish to say here and now that I have not one unkind feeling towards the colored people of the South. They have always been polite and kind and faithful to me and to my family under all circumstances, and I should be ashamed to return to my home and look either the colored or the white people of my district in the face if I should say otherwise. If I know my own heart, I have a sincere desire to see the colored people of the South prosper; and I say without the slightest hesitation that I have a most profound conviction the passage of this bill will be a most damaging blow to their best interests and will postpone indefinitely the solution of the most serious problems by which they are confronted. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM].

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, the time at my command will not afford me opportunity for any complete or systematic discussion of this bill. I must therefore premit any attempted analysis of its provisions in detail, and rest the case on what others have said as to its faultiness of construction and general incertitude; its intricacies and complications; its doubtful interpretation; the troubles that must inevitably arise from and attend upon any effort at its practical enforcement; its espionage over and interference with the liberties of the citizen; its multiplication of offenses, pains, and penalties; the discordant, cumbersome, and costly machinery which it is proposed by its provisions to set in operation; its solicitation to raid upon the public Treasury, and the inevitable clash and conflict it must produce with State laws and State authorities if its ultimate passage and application shall be consummated. The dissection and criticism which its terms and compass invite as to these and other infirmities and vices I must forego, and content myself with the statement that its purpose, its scope, and structure can not successfully stand before the deliberate judgment of earnest, enlightened, patriotic, and thoughtful men. Wherever the sway of passion and prejudice yields to calm and careful investigation, it will meet, as it deserves, an abiding and irrefragable condemnation.

But I feel impressed; Mr. Speaker, with a sense of representative duty, too strong and urgent to be stifled or suppressed, to record my intense and uncompromising hostility to the enactment of the legislation now proposed. Never since I have been a member here have my fears and apprehensions for the safety and tranquillity of my country been so aroused, my sense of patriotism so shocked and startled, my devotion to the basic principles of republican institutions so wrought upon, my pride of Americanism so assailed, and my hopes for the future dignity and integrity of the States in their autonomy, and the Union in its appropriate exercise of delegated authority so depressed, as have resulted from the contemplation of this awful movement. I feel, and seriously feel, that we stand in the presence of an impending deadly peril to the very foundation of the traditions and institutions of our country—that the house our fathers built is about to be destroyed, and that amid its ruins will be crushed the furniture of free and distinctive popular government.

Sir, when the framers of the Constitution formulated our organic law they left around the States the sacred circle of autonomy. Their utterances and the history of their deliberations, as well as the contemporaneous construction by the people of that period, all go to prove that it was never contemplated or intended that improper, aggressive, Federal power should make a step or plant a foot within the domain thus defined. The "States respectively and the people" have never surrendered to the General Government the power to interfere with or assume control of their own internal affairs. They have jealously kept to themselves the entire residuary mass of authority not expressly delegated to the United States.

There is no more cardinal and distinctive element of our national life than that of the right of suffrage, the right to vote. This primary and fundamental privilege of free participation in the exercise of political power; this right to "choose" legislators and public functionaries "by the people," more clearly than all others, perhaps, illustrates the difference between republics and monarchies. Here we have no hereditary official succession. Here men are not born rulers of the people. Here sovereignty is the people. So odious and distasteful was any designation of inequality in citizenship to our fathers that they have declared to us, as a supreme doctrine for our guidance, "No title of nobility shall be granted by the United States."

There was no subject which more thoroughly awoke the solicitude and engaged the long and serious attention of those who framed the Constitution than that of suffrage and the manner of its exercise. It came well nigh disrupting the convention at one time when the point was reached, even, concerning the rule of suffrage and the matter of voicing representation in the two branches of the National Legislature. It was reported by Martin that the convention was "on the verge of dissolution, scarce held together by the strength of a hair." It was at that crucial juncture when Franklin proposed that the convention should be opened every morning by prayer, and said:

The longer I live the more convincing proofs I see that God governs in the affairs of men. I firmly believe that "except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it."

It was not unconsidered nor unforeseen that some evils, some unfairness, some injustice as the result of improper influence, adverse conditions, and even wicked combinations might accompany and impair the integrity of popular elections, and Mr. Mason said in the convention—

That much had been alleged against democratic elections. He admitted that much might be said, but that it was to be considered that no government was free from imperfections and evils, and that improper elections in many instances were inseparable from republican governments. But compare these with the advantages of this form in favor of the rights of the people, in favor of human nature.

Verily, in the genesis of this great Republic our ancestors knew whereof they spoke, and with marvelous comprehension appreciated the entire problem of popular government and national economy. Finally there was evolved from the grave deliberations of the convention the proposition found in section 4, Article I, of the Constitution:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof, but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

I am aware of the construction which this provision of the Constitution has received at the hands of the Supreme Court, and I accept if I do not indorse, I obey if I do not approve, what the courts decide as the ultimate conclusion. It doubtless is true that Congress has the power by express grant both to "make" and "alter such regulations," but I shall always believe that it was never intended to be exercised except in the case of non-action by the States in the matter of providing for and securing representation in Congress, or in the event of other and graver emergencies than are now to be found in any of the States of the Union, or causes essentially different from those upon which the support of this bill is attempted to be justified.

After a careful reading of the debates in the convention and the history of the times, I am impressed that it was never contemplated to allow Congress to unmake or destroy reasonable regulations of common application in the matter of Federal elections, which the States in their capacities as such might make, or without the gravest necessities to alter the regulations adopted by the States. That the States should ever degenerate to mere local dependencies upon Federal power was utterly foreign to the purpose of the Constitution and the causes of its adoption.

Appropriate action has been had by the States all over the Union in the matter of Federal elections. Each and every State is represented here by members chosen by the people in pursuance of the laws prescribed by the respective Legislatures thereof. It seems to me absurd to say that the people may choose their Representatives and then allow that choice to be coerced or reversed and nullified by the fiat of partisan Federal officials.

A period of forty years—

Said Mr. Story when he wrote on the Constitution—has since passed by without any attempt by Congress to make any regulations or interfere in the slightest degree with the election of members of Congress. If, therefore, experience can demonstrate anything, it is the entire safety of the power in Congress, which it is scarcely possible (reasoning from the past) should be exerted unless upon very urgent occasions.

After mentioning the variety and want of uniformity in the manner of elections in different States, and other inconveniences, as well as even occasional failure of representation on the part of some of them at extra sessions, the same learned author says:

Still, so strong has been the sense of Congress of the importance of leaving these matters to State regulation that no effort has been hitherto made to cure these evils; and public opinion has almost irresistibly settled down in favor of the existing system.

Mr. Speaker, this bill involves a dangerous departure from the system approved and crystallized by the thought and policy of a century. Whatever may have been decided by the courts of last resort upon the cases before them as to the power of Congress in the premises, I can not and will not believe that we shall ever see the day when all the provisions and purposes of this iniquitous measure will receive judicial sanction.

But if the power be conceded, whence arises any extreme and urgent necessity for its exercise? What extraordinary circumstances, what perilous emergencies demand that in this, the last decade of the nineteenth century, the statute-books of the United States should be blurred and blotted with this untoward and abnormal legislation? Congress has the power "to declare war and grant letters of marque and reprisal," but who would contend that such a power should now be invoked, when we are at peace with the nations of the earth?

Why is this measure thrust upon legislative attention, and by extreme and arbitrary exercise of parliamentary dictation sought to be driven to speedy and indeliberate conclusion in this great House of the people? What is the real animus of this movement?

In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, it is born of the exigencies of partisan malevolence and partisan struggle for the perpetuation of the political party supremacy which now controls every department of the Federal Government; but I will do the majority in this House the justice to say that it meets the opposition of some of its members who are in a position which qualifies them to fully appreciate and anticipate the detriment it necessarily involves; and there are others whose judgment and discretion, I think, do not affirm its propriety, and who, I believe, would gladly escape the party necessity which constrains them to its reluctant support.

Mr. Speaker, however general and comprehensive the terms of this bill may be, as maintained by its advocates, whatever may be said as to its object of national application, he is a dull observer and an incautious listener to the utterances of its supporters in the range of this discussion upon it who has failed to perceive that it is designed to be essentially sectional in its character, and that its operations are expected to be limited to given localities, to certain districts. It is aimed, possibly, not at the entire South, but to particular districts in particular Southern States. It seemed to me that what was said by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] as to certain conditions which obtained in New York twenty years ago, and his deductions therefrom, were employed but as a spring-board from which to jump upon the special field he designed to reach—the so-called "negro districts" in the South.

No specific attack is apparent against the State which I have the honor in part to represent, and there seems to be no pretense of complaint against the integrity of its ballot and the honesty of its enumeration. I can say for the district of which I am the accredited Representative—the ninety-seven counties, embracing an area as large as ten States of this Union, which I could designate, whose sovereign people have sent me here for four terms, that we can live under any Federal election law which can be tolerated by the voters of Maine or Massachusetts. You might dump the whole State of Massachusetts within that Congressional district and its entire territory would not make a respectable cattle-ranch. [Laughter.] It has a cosmopolitan population. Its immigration comes from almost every State in the Union, and from across the great waters. Northern capital has found safe and profitable investment within its limits. The ex-Union soldier lives side by side with the ex-Confederate soldier—one fence frequently divides their farms and ranches—they send their children to the same school, worship at the same church, vote at the same ballot-box, and as a general thing the same ticket. They feel that the war is over and the day of hate and bitterness is ended.

Mr. Speaker, there is, I think, a total ignorance and misconception among many people, well informed on other subjects, as to the real feeling of the Southern white people towards the negro. That there have been sporadic disturbances and occasional clash between the two races is not denied, and it could hardly be expected that such could be escaped. What troubles we have had in the past have been greatly instigated by unworthy and designing local white men, bent not so much on accomplishing the good of the black man, or prompted by any respect or affection for him, as the compassing of their own selfish purposes and the utilization of race prejudice from unmanly motives and to sinister ends.

No one has, no one can have, in my judgment, the same sympathy for the colored people that their former owners entertain. Why, sir, we grew up with them, we played with them in boyhood, we have been thrown in daily contact with them both before and since the war, and they are, as a rule, attached to us, strange as the statement may sound to some. We have been with them at the cradle and at the grave. We understand their natures and dispositions, and I do not hesitate to declare that we are better friends to them and would be more to relieve them in distress than those who express so much concern and commiseration for them from a distance. The difficulties we have had are passing away; they are growing less and less as the years go by. We are educating them, upbuilding them, and preparing them for the duties and responsibilities of life; and they are learning habits of thrift, acquiring property, and gradually growing wiser and better.

Time and change and the evolutions of experience will finally work out the entire problem of the race question much more speedily and satisfactorily than can possibly be effected by resort to force, to doubtful methods, or appeals to passion. You concede that you must leave them where our State laws place them in all matters not distinctively Federal, that you can not invade the province of defined State control over its own citizens, and the responsibility and obligations of such citizens to State government. You are gracious enough to tell us that we are allowed to conduct our elections for State officers in our own way and after the manner of our own enactment. This privilege and this duty and the demands of our civilization and the conditions around and about us all admonish us of the real importance of the situation and prompt us to all earnest and suitable efforts.

There is not an intelligent and patriotic white man in the South who does not realize and appreciate the extent of the rights of the colored man as a citizen. I doubt if there be one man in one hundred who would put him back into slavery if he could. While his manumission fell heavily on our old men, and many of them never recovered from the shock and gloom consequent upon the sudden, irretrievable loss of what his slavery involved, laying aside all considerations as to the manner of his emancipation and kindred questions, experience has taught me to believe, and practical observation has brought me to the conclusion, that to the young men of the South it has been not without an advantage. We all know that the black man is destined to live not only among us, but among our children's children; and knowing that fact begets within us a desire and solicitude for his future well-being as well as our own. Is it, then, asking too much when we say to you, "Let us alone and trust to our conservatism and patriotism in the solution of a problem the gravity of which and the consequences involved we fully understand and from any unfortunate issue of which we constantly pray a safe deliverance?" Upon us immediately is to fall the result of any mistake and mismanagement into which by any possibility we may be led.

Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to review the history of the war or the causes that brought it about—to dwell upon that terrific struggle in which billions of treasure were expended and sacrificed and the souls of a million of men went from the deadly field or the gloomy hospital to the realm of final account. It is enough to say that the spirit that led men to the cannon's mouth in organized effort to maintain their conscientious convictions on either side in that awful conflict are entitled to the respect and admiration of all mankind. Those who had "a place in the picture near the flashing of the guns," who underwent a community of peril, and know what actual martial service means, can not despise the nerve and valor which characterized the Southern soldiery. It is a marvel in the annals of all warfare that we were able for the four long and blood-stained years from Sumter to Appomattox to withstand the overwhelming forces we encountered. Verily, we "charged armies while all the world wondered," and how often "the red field was ours" is almost incredible to relate.

When the end came and the arbitrament of the bayonet had settled the issue, foot-sore and weary, battle-scarred and exhausted, we returned to our wasted homes. We summoned around us our colored people, who represented millions of dollars to us, and which by the laws of our country we had been taught to regard our own, and we told them they were no longer bond, that thenceforth and forever they were to be free. We supplemented these individual declarations by legislative ratification of your constitutional amendments. We passed laws in pursuance thereof. We went through the dark and desperate period of reconstruction, when wanton extravagance and reckless prodigality and unblushing fraud and corruption played havoc with such resources as the war had left us. Verily, we victis was written on every page of that shameful history.

With renaissant strength, patient endeavor, and phenomenal energy we have survived it all and are to-day on the high road to wonderful prosperity and the most promising achievement. Our "wilderness and solitary places have been made glad and our deserts do blossom as the rose." The springs of industrial enterprise which had ceased to flow have started afresh, and no broad-gauged and liberal-minded American, I care not from whence he may come, can visit our region, mingle with our people, and witness our material development and all the conditions of our civilization without a feeling of pride and gratification.

Northern people who have since the war cast their lots with us and constitute a part of our citizenship have by the processes of attrition and association been led to blend their aspirations with ours, and feel a commutual interest in all that concerns our quietude and success. Take testimony of them, and few, indeed, would be found who would approve the spirit and objects that actuate the passage of this bill, or view without the profoundest concern and apprehension the results to follow it.

Mr. Speaker, one of the most brilliant pieces of oratory that adorned the great tariff debate in the last Congress was the product of the brain and genius of the accomplished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] when at the close of his speech he spoke of the South. Eliminate from it the fact that it was delivered on a different subject, and strike from it the support of high taxation, and how beautifully applicable it would be to the measure now under consideration. With the qualifications indicated, I desire to embellish what I here say with its reproduction:

Let me warn you, gentlemen of the South, that this measure bodes no good to you. It will arrest the investment of capital in your midst and bring your industries to a standstill. There is no portion of our country where this measure should meet with a more united and determined opposition than in the South. Untoward circumstances have heretofore retarded her material progress, but the way is now open for her to march unimpeded to a splendid industrial future. The advance is already sounded. He who does not respond to its inspiring summons will soon find himself without a party and without a following.

I rejoice that there is a new South, a new industrial South, born of the throes of war, but full of hope and full of courage. [Applause.] She stands to-day with uplifted brow facing the dawn of a mighty future. Her loins are girt for a new race. With unfettered hands she smiles the earth, and fountains of unmeasured wealth gush forth. Beneath her feet she feels the stir of a marvelous life. Her pathway is already illumined with the light of blazing furnaces. Her heavens are aglow with the break of a new day. All hail its coming!

"Aid its dawning, tongue and pen;
Aid it, hopes of honest men;
Aid it, paper; aid it, type;
Aid it, for the hour is ripe;
And our earnest must not slacken into play.
Men of thought and men of action, clear the way!"

And when the sun shall reach the zenith of that glorious day the North and the South, cemented in the indissoluble bonds of commercial and fraternal unity, will stand together under the banner of protection to American industries and American labor to grander industrial triumphs. [Great applause.]

No one can describe the "mighty future" of this fair and sunny land if left untrammelled by unfriendly Federal legislation. Give her a fair show in the "new race," treat her justly, respect the rights of her people as sovereign States in this glorious Union, and she will work out her own salvation to the joy of her own sons and the delight of the American people.

Mr. Speaker, the clarion voice of your Napoleonic leader on this floor rang out during the last year the proclamation that "The verdict at Appomattox must be affirmed!" It caught the spirit intended to be reached. It set in motion, in my opinion, the tide that surges in upon us to-day. Let me say that that verdict has long since been recorded and judgment rendered upon it. It needs no allas or pluries writs. It has been absolutely satisfied, and those who were cast by that verdict are entitled to "go hence without day." Who knew better how to interpret its significance and give opinion upon its effect than the mighty Foreman whose martial prowess announced it to the world? What said your Soldier-President? Surveying the whole situation and looking over the field where but recently "were heard the notes of war," your victorious leader said:

Let us have peace!

The whole South re-echoes this grand sentiment. Would that every man who went with him "in the thickest of the fight" could catch the inspiration of this historic utterance of General Grant, and strive to perpetuate the policy thus announced by him! Is this measure, I solemnly inquire, in keeping with the advice of your great commander?

There is a community of sentiment among ex-soldiers. All truly valorous men are magnanimous, and have a genuine respect for martial courage.

The soldier braves death for a fanciful wreath
In glory's romantic career;
But he raises the foe when in battle laid low
And bathes every wound with a tear!

Is it within the hearts of any of you to strike that "uplifted brow," so eloquently described by Mr. BURROWS, beaming with new hope, which was so recently darkened by the clouds of war? If the form once prostrate in defeat has risen without resentment, would you hurl it to the earth again? If you could only realize as we do how this measure is destined to retard our progress, destroy confidence, impair our development, engender strife, revive bitterness, relegate us to the dark and deplorable conditions of reconstruction, and produce only evil, and that continually, I am persuaded that there would be found among you a sufficient number of warm, generous, and heroic men, who would unite in seeking to avert the calamity that now overhangs us. [Applause.]

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Speaker, sixty years ago, in the Senate of the United States, the great statesman from Massachusetts, Daniel Webster, uttered these words:

When the mariner has been tossed for many days on an unknown sea he avails himself of the first pause in the storm and the earliest glance of the sun to take his latitude and ascertain how far the elements have driven him from his true course.

It would be wise and prudent and patriotic now for the Representative from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] who introduced the pending bill, and his associates, to pause and take their latitude and ascertain how far they have drifted from the true course dictated by the fathers and laid down in the Constitution.

The bill under consideration is one of the most important and far-reaching and dangerous bills ever submitted to the Congress of the United States. Its provisions are audacious, arbitrary, despotic, and desperate. In many respects it is worse than the so-called "force bill" which was so gallantly and successfully opposed by Hon. Samuel J. Randall and his associates in the Forty-first Congress. That bill was the result of feelings and animosities engendered by terrible civil war. This bill is the result of greed for office and a desire to perpetuate Republican rule. Never before has the Republican majority of the House of Representatives so openly and boldly attempted to subvert the rights of the States and trample on the powers reserved to the States and to the people respectively.

Never before has the Republican majority undertaken to force through this House, under what is equivalent to a gag rule, a bill granting almost unlimited power over the election of Representatives in Congress and elections of President and Vice-President to Republicans who under the bill are authorized to act according to the utterances of the Speaker of the House in his Pittsburgh speech—"do their own registration, their own counting, and their own certification." It is true we are allowed a few hours on this side to discuss this bill; but when it is remembered that the questions involved affect the rights of the States, the sacred right of suffrage, and the Constitution of our country, the little time allowed is hardly worth using.

If this bill should pass it will change election methods in our Republic to which people have been accustomed since the days of Adams and Jefferson and Jackson. It will set aside rights of the States which have been sanctioned by a century of usage, and it will break down barriers that have heretofore separated the great co-ordinate departments of the Government known as the executive, the legislative, and the judicial departments. There will not only be Federal control of the election of members of Congress, and of the election of President and Vice-President of the United States, but eventually the same power will control the election of State and county officials. Changes and encroachments will follow rapidly, and the future will be filled with problems and difficulties and outrages directly traceable to this bill.

I am in favor of free, fair elections, and I believe that the destinies of a free and intelligent nation depend on the purity and freedom of elections, but I deny that such legislation is needed now as is contained in the pending bill. This bill covers seventy-three printed pages and has fifty-seven sections, and in addition thereto it re-enacts or amends thirty-eight sections of the Revised Statutes and acts of Congress relating to the judiciary, civil rights, the elective franchise, appropriations, and crimes.

It purports to be a bill to amend and supplement the election laws of the United States and to provide for the more efficient enforcement of such laws, but it should be entitled "A bill that aims at the control of Federal elections and provides for the more efficient enforcement of Republican rule."

Its provisions will be enforced in any Congressional district of the United States on the petition of one hundred voters of the district.

It authorizes the appointment of chief supervisors by the United States circuit judges, who hold office for life, are amenable to no person, and are election dictators in their respective districts. These chief supervisors appoint three supervisors for each election precinct and they may increase the number of election officers at will without consulting Congress and pay them from the public Treasury without limit as to the aggregate amount. Indeed, the voters of the United States, the Treasury, and the Army and Navy are placed under the control of the chief supervisors and supervisors while they are managing and controlling elections, and the chief supervisor may, after consultation with the United States district marshal, have as many deputy marshals appointed as may seem to be necessary, and in the absence of deputy marshals the supervisors have the full power of deputy marshals and may arrest a voter if challenging him does not accomplish all that is desired. If this is not imperialism, what is it?

The bill also provides for the appointment in each State by the judge of the United States circuit court of a returning board or board of canvassers, who receive the returns from the precincts in the various counties and hear evidence if they think proper, and then declare and certify under their hands and seals who is elected Representative in Congress, and the individual so certified is to be placed by the Clerk of the House of Representatives on the roll of members elected, and thus authorized to participate in the organization of the next House of Representatives. These boards of canvassers have autocratic power far beyond any power or authority granted to any similar board in the world. They can make, according to their own sweet will, the House of Representatives of the United States. Under the bill they can certify any candidate as duly elected a member of Congress, no matter if he received only 1,000 votes while his opponent received 10,000 votes, and the Clerk of the House of Representatives is compelled under heavy penalty to place the name so certified on his list of Congressmen. Only one remedy is open to the legally elected member and that is the right to contest the election, but it is fair to presume that he would have to wait until hope deferred made the heart sick before he would be allowed a seat in a House of Representatives chosen under this bill.

It requires the appointment of thousands of new officers at high salaries, aggregating millions of dollars, and as there are 54,649 election precincts in the United States there will be 163,947 supervisors, without counting deputy marshals, clerks, inspectors, canvassers, and other officers, and this luxurious and iniquitous bill will draw from the United States Treasury biennially not less than $10,000,000.

It authorizes Federal officers to arrest Democrats or other persons whom they may see fit to accuse of political offenses and drag them from home and friends to be tried before partisan judges and by, perhaps, packed jurors, selected, not by a jury commission, as has been the law for years, but by a partisan clerk.

The intricacies and incongruities of this lengthy bill are so great that it will be almost impossible to have an election in accordance with its provisions, but there seems to be method in this, for ample power is given to the returning board, or board of canvassers, if this act is not strictly complied with, to certify that the Republican is elected.

This bill is so foreign to all the institutions of our Government, so different from the election usages with which our people have been familiar for a hundred years, and so antagonistic to the liberty and equality for which our fathers fought, that debate and deliberation seem out of place in connection therewith. It seems that there ought to be behind it the edict of an emperor and the armed and uniformed soldiers of an empire. The framers of the bill seem to have been duly impressed with the tendencies of such legislation and therefore they place both the Army and Navy at the disposal of the President to preserve the peace at the polls or to aid in the enforcement of the law. They also authorize the President to order troops to any State in the Union prior to an election for the ostensible purpose of aiding in the enforcement of the law, but they can be used, as they have been used in the past, to influence or control elections.

Mr. Speaker, such are the important provisions of the bill which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has linked his name with so prominently. He should look out lest it become a shirt of Nessus to him.

This is the bill with which he strews the pathway of the negro to the polls with flowers while the white man is required to march between partisan officials and bristling bayonets to exercise the God-given right of a freeman, and we are asked to pass this bill when we stand almost in the sunshine and splendor of the one hundred and fourteenth anniversary of the Declaration of American Independence.

This is the bill on which he hung garlands of eloquence and imaginary fairness at the opening of the debate, and made us marvel on this side at the indifference with which men sometimes tramp with elephantine feet on the rights of the States and the Constitution of the country.

Like Macbeth, he followed too far "the dangerous visions and unhallowed hopes of a bewitched ambition."

This is the bill which is to illustrate American liberty and American equality. This is the bill which is to show the result of a century of popular government in the fairest and best land in the world. While Switzerland is settling down in the glories of a firm and enduring Republic, while France is appreciating so earnestly the blessings of the new Republic, and the Irish patriots are praying for the early day when Ireland will be free, while all the nations of North America, Central America, and South America have taken our Republic for their model and overthrown monarchies and empires, Brazil being the last to join the sisterhood of republics, while the movement of mankind is toward freedom and popular government all over the world, shall we now humiliate ourselves and discourage liberty-loving people everywhere by the passage of this bill? I say may God forbid such unjust and unnecessary legislation.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] says he gets his authority for the unprecedented legislation proposed in this bill in section 4, Article I, of the Constitution of the United States, which is as follows:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

Passing by the stupendous fact that our Republic has lasted for more than a century, and had severe trials and civil commotions and no such legislation was ever enacted, I assert that it is clear that when the framers of the Constitution declared that "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof" they conferred an original and primary power on the State Legislatures to regulate the times, places, and manner of holding Congressional elections, and that a secondary and ultimate power or a permissive and contingent power was conferred on Congress to make or alter such regulations, and, as has been well said, "it is a necessary implication from the language of the text that the permissive and contingent power of Congress is to be exercised, if exercised at all, according to the provisions of the context, found in clause 18, section 9, Article I, of the Constitution," which provides that Congress shall have power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers," etc.

If, therefore, the State Legislatures perform their duty under the fourth section of Article I of the Constitution, the contingency on which Congressional action depends will not have occurred; but where the State Legislatures refuse or neglect to enact laws fixing the times, places, and manner of electing Congressmen, or if they enact laws hostile to the General Government, or where they are unable to do so because of rebellion or other cause, then Congress may intervene and establish such regulations as will secure the representation authorized by the Constitution.

The men who framed the Constitution possessed great wisdom and sound judgment and they did not intend to confer the same original and primary power as regards the election of Congressmen on the State Legislatures and on Congress, and there is abundant reason for making this statement.

My time is so limited that I can not discuss Article IV, section 1, of the Constitution as fully as I desire, but I wish to say with emphasis that I have no doubt that the pending bill is against the letter as well as the spirit of the Constitution. This section of the Constitution on which the friends of the bill rely created more uneasiness in the minds of the members of the convention than all of its other provisions. Seven of the thirteen original States declared against the powers of Congress to exercise the authority claimed by the friends of this bill, and I especially commend to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] the action of the grand old Commonwealth which he in part represents in this House.

On the 6th of February, 1788, Massachusetts, through her State convention, presided over by the great Revolutionary patriot, John Hancock, ratified the Constitution. In the report of ratification, after expressing the opinion that certain amendments should be made to "remove the fears and quiet the apprehension of many of the good people of this Commonwealth, and more effectually guard against an undue administration of the Federal Government," the following alteration of and provision to the Constitution is suggested:

That Congress do not exercise the powers vested in them by the fourth section of the first article but in cases when a State shall neglect or refuse to make the regulations therein mentioned, or shall make regulations subversive of the rights of the people to a free and equal representation in Congress agreeable to the Constitution.

Judge Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, volume 2, chapter 11, discusses the subject ably and exhaustively and holds that the power will not be exercised by Congress unless "an extreme necessity or a very urgent exigency should arise."

Mr. Madison, in the Virginia convention, when asked his opinion of this section, said:

It was found necessary to leave the regulation of these [times, places, and manner] in the first place to the State governments as being best acquainted with the situation of the people, subject to the control of the General Government, in order to enable it to produce uniformity and prevent its own dissolution. . . . Were they exclusively under the control of the State governments, the General Government might easily be dissolved. But if they be regulated properly by the State Legislatures, the Congressional control will very probably never be exercised.

Hon. John Jay, who was afterwards Chief-Justice of the United States, said, in the New York convention, when this clause was under discussion:

That every government was imperfect unless it had a power of preserving itself. Suppose that by design or accident the States should neglect to appoint the Representatives, certainly there should be some constitutional remedy for this evil. The obvious meaning of the paragraph was that, if this neglect should take place, Congress should have power by law to support the Government, and prevent the dissolution of the Union. He believed this was the design of the Federal convention.

Mr. Speaker, I now pass from the great and important constitutional question, which is very clear to my mind, and I ask, what necessity is there for the passage of this bill? Peace reigns supreme throughout our borders. Prosperity smiles as it never smiled before in the South. Both Republicans and Democrats say that the condition of the colored men in the South is improving and that the race question will be solved sooner and more satisfactorily if let alone by Congress. Why, then, open a Pandora box, the baneful and blighting influences of which will be felt all over the Republic? In the language of a distinguished Republican member of this House, "The bill is a sectional measure, productive of nothing but evil to the South." It will retard the progress and perhaps stop the prosperity of the South and open old war wounds long ago healed.

It will only intensify race prejudice and sweep away the better feelings which have been growing rapidly in the new South. The colored man is now a wage-worker and a wage-earner, and he is interested as deeply as the white man in the prosperity of the South. He has the right to testify in the courts. He has schools for his children, and churches where all may worship God, and the same law spreads its broad wings over him and the white man alike. The colored man loves the South. He loves his people. He is fond of the white man and the white man is fond of him, and he knows that his best friends are in the South. Divinity and time will solve the race problem. Man can not hasten it, but he may hamper it.

Mr. Speaker, no candid man can read the pending bill and think of the circumstances under which it is introduced without believing that there was a purpose which prompted its introduction other than a desire for fair elections; the purpose of the Republicans in pressing this bill is to retain power in the House of Representatives. Each State now has statutes which enable the voter to deposit his ballot and have it fairly counted. These laws are sometimes violated, both North and South. The proper thing to do is to enforce the laws now on the statute-books of the respective States, and not seek to put in the hands of the Republican party now in control of the Government such power as will enable it, even against the will of the people, to retain the control of all branches of the Government.

It is very natural and proper when a man or a party asks for reform to examine the credentials and look into the history of the advocates of reform. If the calcium light of truth is turned on the party now asking for reform a strange and curious history will be presented.

My limited time will not permit me to go into the remarkable and unenviable record made by the Republican party in their efforts to illustrate the meaning of a "free ballot and a fair count." I present simply an extract from a leading New York daily paper, published a few days ago. It is as follows:

The record of the Republican party, from Hayes to Harrison, from Dorsey to Dudley, shows that every one of the three Republican Presidents has been elected either by fraud or the unscrupulous expenditure of vast amounts of money. Rutherford B. Hayes was counted in. Money elected James A. Garfield. That fact was admitted in a memorable speech by Vice-President Arthur at the famous Delmonico banquet given in honor of Stephen W. Dorsey, February 11, 1881.

The last Presidential election, with its "blocks of five," its vast corruption funds, and multifarious questionable methods, is too fresh in the minds of the people to require comment. The record of the Republican party in Louisiana, Florida, and South Carolina in 1876 was so tainted with fraud it will never be forgotten. It cheated the Democrats out of the Presidency and robbed a pure and able statesman of an office to which he was legally elected. Its record in Montana was fraudulent, and its record here in this House in turning out legally elected members, one of whom came here with 13,000 majority, is not a record of honor.

The new Republican judges who are to assist in putting the proposed law in execution are to be appointed by a Republican President who made Swayne judge in Florida and was the friend of Dudley in Indiana, and the same crowd who ran the campaign in 1888 are still on deck thirsting for an opportunity to turn their Republican supervisors and Republican returning boards loose upon the country to capture the Congress this fall and to seize the Presidency in 1892.

Mr. Speaker, I represent a district in a border Southern State where there has been no charge of corruption, intimidation, or undue influences; where we vote virâ voce in every election except for Congressmen; where a Republican judge of the election and a Democratic judge of the election sit side by side while a Republican clerk and a Democratic sheriff in the presence of men of all parties record the names and votes of all legally qualified voters who present themselves, and then send the poll-books and their certificate to the county clerk's office as a perpetual witness of the fair and free election which has been held.

Why should this plan of voting be interfered with? Why should this time-trying and time-honored plan in other States be changed? Why not let each State regulate the time, place, and manner of electing their Representatives as they have heretofore done and as the Constitution authorizes them to do? I call on my friends on the other side of this Chamber to pause and think before they vote for a bill which strikes down the rights of the States and violates the Constitution of the United States. The fruits of this bill, like the apples of Sodom, will turn to ashes on your lips. The results might be pleasing to you for a little while, but oh, you get them at such heavy cost, and soon the Supreme Court of our country, in which I have an abiding confidence, and the people, who love liberty and popular government far better than a degenerate party, will rise in their might and the court will condemn your bill as unconstitutional and the people will drive you from the temple which you will profane and pollute if you pass the pending bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

THE SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. McCREARY. I only wish two minutes more.

THE SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the gentleman will be allowed to proceed for two minutes. No objection is heard, and the gentleman from Kentucky will proceed.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I desire to put on record my most earnest protest against the passage of the pending bill.

I protest against the passage of the bill because the Constitution of the United States in the first article declares "the House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States," and this bill allows the board of canvassers, not the people, to select the members of the House of Representatives.

I protest against the passage of this bill because it so mingles State and Federal power in the control and management of popular elections that confusion and collision of authority are sure to occur.

I protest against the passage of this bill because it connects Federal courts with political schemes, and authorizes Federal judges to dominate and control the legislative department of the Government, when the framers of the Constitution intended that the three great co-ordinate departments, the executive, the legislative, and judicial departments, should always be independent of each other.

I protest against the passage of this bill because it is not needed for the regulation of Congressional elections, no State having neglected or refused to prescribe "the time, place, and manner of holding elections for Representatives," but all having reasonable and adequate provisions for such elections.

I protest against the passage of this bill because it will require an expense of millions of dollars annually, authorizes the appointment of nearly two hundred thousand new salaried officers, and will bring ballots and bayonets, soldiers and supervisors, so close together at the polls that there can be no free and fair election.

And finally, I believe the bill should be despised and defeated because it is un-Democratic, un-Republican, and unconstitutional. [Applause.]

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Speaker, my time is limited, and I hope I may be permitted to proceed in what I have to say without interruption. I regard this bill as a political measure of the most desperate and dangerous character. There is a reason for its presentation at this time which has not been presented to this House, either in the report of the committee or in the debates on this floor. We have had an abundant use of words to conceal ideas and purposes in this debate, and the utterances of the friends of this measure would seem to be designed to conceal and mislead as to its true nature and purpose. I know, sir, it is claimed by its advocates that its presence here at this juncture of our political affairs is due to alleged abuses and irregularities in the elections in some of the States, but at the same time, and in the same breath, they confess that these alleged reasons for such a law have existed for an indefinite period of time.

To argue the question of the constitutionality of the measure here would be, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] truly says, "a waste of time." The derision and scorn with which the Constitution is treated by the majority of this House when it stands in the way of party ends, and the deep and solemn hypocrisy with which some of its provisions are invoked as authority for trampling on other provisions equally clear and plain, when some political villainy is to be perpetuated, fully justifies the declaration of the gentleman.

It has too long been the habit of a certain class of politicians to treat the Constitution as a juggler's device to help to deceive the people in order to plunder them, to render necessary such a statement as the honorable gentleman has made. King Caucus is, in the estimation of too many members, greater than the Constitution, and absolves all obligations to even consider the oath taken to support it when party interests are involved. [Applause.]

This House and the country may well inquire why this sudden awakening to the necessity of having the Federal Government take charge of the elections in the States when the cause of ballot reform is sweeping the country. I will not stop to discuss the state of facts alleged to exist in some of the States by the advocates of this bill, for we all know that much of what is said of elections in the South is untrue and that much of what is solemnly stated here as the truth is known to have been manufactured or exaggerated and distorted for political use and effect. Telling the truth in regard to every lawless act in any State or community is bad enough, but the artistic touch of the political liar makes it appear much worse.

The Pecksniffian exhibitions of superior virtue, the "holier than thou" assumptions, the Jekyll and Hyde transformations of Falstaffian bloody-shirt shriekers on the other side of this House will not stop the people of thought and reason in this country from inquiring what is the true motive and purpose in urging this measure at this time. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, the true answer to that question must be sought, not in Machiavelian utterances in this debate, but in the exigencies of the political situation. It can not be claimed and maintained that the existing conditions have retarded the progress of the South or disturbed the peace and harmony of the races. The South is more prosperous to-day a hundred-fold than she has been since 1861. There is not in the Union any equal number of States more peaceful and quiet, whose people are more industrious and progressive. Only the day before yesterday I picked up a Tennessee newspaper giving an account of the inauguration of new enterprises in the South, which showed forty-seven new enterprises inaugurated within the past week involving many millions of dollars.

Then this bill is not intended, I am sure, to bring peace and prosperity to the South. These the Southern States already enjoy in a greater degree than many of their less fortunate sister States. I imagine that if the gentlemen who are pressing this measure were as much interested in the people of the South as their utterances might lead us to believe they would be wanting to send their money among us for investment, as thousands of Eastern capitalists are doing, instead of seeking to send non-resident and irresponsible political agents among us to stir up strife and arouse race prejudices among our people.

Mr. Speaker, I can not speak for every State, but I can and will speak for Tennessee, and thank God that I am able to deliver the message that she recognizes the fact that she is in the Union on an equal footing with every other State and she will welcome with open arms all true and honest men who come to share her prosperity and to contribute to her wealth, come from what quarter they may; but the old Volunteer State, true to her traditions, will condemn and punish any political party or set of men that seek to subvert this Government and to take away the liberties of the people, as this bill proposes to do. Tennessee wants no foreign interference with her affairs and she will have none of it.

What is this bill? Where did it originate, and what is its purpose? These are pertinent questions.

It is a bill which assumes absolute control over all elections in the States at which members of Congress are voted for.

It proposes to take away from the States the constitutional right to determine the qualification of voters and vests that power in supervisors to be appointed by the Federal courts, who may be non-residents and strangers to the people whose elections they are to be appointed to control.

It declares that elections shall be held in accordance with the provisions of this bill, and that all State laws in conflict with this bill shall be annulled.

It provides that the returns of the returning boards which it creates in every State shall be conclusive on the Clerk of this House, regardless of the certificate of the governor under the great seal of the State, and that the Clerk must enter on the rolls the person certified by those returning boards as elected to this House under the penalties of fine and imprisonment.

It provides for the appointment for life of a chief supervisor in each judicial district in the United States, whose compensation will probably amount to $2,000 per annum.

It provides for the appointment of more than three hundred thousand supervisors, probably as many as three hundred and fifty thousand, one-half of whom shall perform duty at a compensation of $5 per day when canvassing or inspecting and supervising registration, and $10 per day in cities of 100,000 or more for services on election day. In cities of 100,000 or more inhabitants they may be paid for twelve days' service $65 each; in other places where there is a registration for not more than six days at $5 per day, or $30 each; and in all other places not more than three days, or $15 each. So it will be seen at the lowest calculation the fees for supervisors alone at each election may reach $2,500,000.

I give the official estimate of the number of election precincts in the different States which under this bill would require six supervisors each, three to perform actual service at each election.

The above figures are obtained (except those estimated) from secretaries of state, and mostly refer to the date of the Presidential election in 1888. For Pennsylvania, however, the figures are from Smull's Hand-Book, containing the election returns for 1889. Of the election districts or precincts for that State 815 were in Philadelphia.

The table does not contain the numbers for the Territories of Arizona, Idaho, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming. Of course the number of election precincts has been considerably increased since the election of 1888.

It provides that these supervisors shall make a house-to-house canvass before the election when required to do so by the chief supervisor.

It provides in section 20 that so many deputy marshals shall be appointed by the United States marshals as may be required by the chief supervisors, and in section 19 it provides that special deputy marshals shall receive a compensation of $5 per day for not exceeding eight days or $40 each. Under this provision there is no limitation upon the power of the chief supervisor to have special deputies appointed by the marshal, and he may have one hundred or ten thousand appointed in each Congressional district. The charge upon the Treasury is absolutely unlimited, and under the provisions of this bill the expenditure may reach anywhere from four to eight millions of dollars at each election for deputy marshals alone.

It provides for the appointment of a United States board of canvassers in each State, composed of three members, at a compensation of $20 per day for fifteen days' service, and one clerk to each board at $12 per day for fifteen days' service, which in all the States would make a charge on the Treasury of $45,360.

The chief supervisors are to be appointed by the judges of the district courts, who hold office for life; and the supervisors are to be appointed by the same power, thus divorcing elections from the people of the States and vesting all power in officers who are absolutely free from any responsibility to the people.

Mr. Speaker, in the limited time allowed me I can not go further into the details of this bill, except to call attention to the peculiar provision which repeals the present law to regulate the selection of jurors in the Federal courts, a law adopted for the express purpose of securing non-partisan and impartial juries, and enacts in its place a provision which provides for the selection of partisan juries by partisan clerks. When I come to consider the purpose of this bill I will recur to some of these provisions again.

Where did this bill originate, Mr. Speaker? The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] thinks it sprung forth from his busy brain, "like Minerva, full-armed, from the brain of Jove."

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] thinks that he evolved it with much mental travail from the bowels of his prolific mind.

Many others in their vain imaginings no doubt feel that they know its true parentage.

At the risk of creating a family disturbance I propose to give its history.

It was born of political necessity and its father is monopoly. Its forerunner and accoucheur was the Hon. THOMAS B. REED, Speaker of this House, who attended the feast of Belshazzar, at Pittsburgh, Pa., some weeks ago, and to the representatives of monopoly there assembled proclaimed the coming of this bill. He declared the purpose of the Republican party to do "its own registration, its own voting, and its own certification." John the Baptist when he came preaching in the wilderness was not surer of his mission than was this modern prophet of a new system of political government. Mr. Speaker REED on that occasion was the spokesman and prophet of the allied monopolies, and he had a right to know the obligation of the bond between the powers which bought the majority in this Congress and the control of this Administration at the last election and the ruling and controlling powers here.

Mr. Speaker, I here and now proclaim my earnest and solemn belief that this bill owes its presence here to-day to the fact that the monopolies which bought the last election demand it as a safeguard and protection against the growing spirit of Democracy among the people.

I challenge the denial here and now that the election of 1888 was bought with a price by the monopolies and trusts of this country. On that point I desire to introduce the confidential circular of Mr. James P. Foster, president of the Republican League of the United States. It was the signal gun of the campaign of 1888. Hear him:

[Confidential.]

HEADQUARTERS REPUBLICAN LEAGUE OF THE UNITED STATES,
New York, May 25, 1888.

MY DEAR SIR: The Republican League of the United States desires to bring you face to face with the startling fact that the coming Presidential election is not to be fought on the old party lines which have heretofore divided Democrats and Republicans, but upon the direct issue of free trade vs. protection. We will win this fight if you will do your share and help us to finish what we have begun. We want money, and want it at once.

It may not be of your personal knowledge, but it is a fact nevertheless, that the manufacturers of the United States who are most benefited by our tariff laws have been the least willing to contribute to the success of the party which gave them protection and which is about to engage in a life-and-death struggle with free trade.

A Republican United States Senator, from a State which never had a Democratic Representative in either House of Congress or a Democratic State officer, in speaking of the well-known disposition of the manufacturing interests to lock up its money, fold its hands, and look on while somebody else fights for its success, says:

"The campaign which we are about to enter will concern, more than anybody else, the manufacturers of this country. They have hitherto been very laggard in their contributions to the Republican cause. In fact, if I could punish them without punishing the cause of protection itself, I would consign them to the hottest place I could think of on account of their craven parsimony. If this class of people do not care to contribute to the success of the Republican party, they are welcome to try their chances under a Democratic Administration; I can stand it as long as they can."

"In fact, I have it from the best possible sources that the manufacturers of Pennsylvania, who are more highly protected than anybody else and who make large fortunes every year when times are prosperous, practically give nothing towards the maintenance of the ascendancy of the Republican party. Of course I shall not violate what I consider to be a proper principle of action, but if I had my way about it I would put the manufacturers of Pennsylvania under the fire and fry all the fat out of them. If the Mills tariff bill comes to the Senate there will be some votes cast there which will open the eyes of some of these people who have, while gathering their millions, treated the Republican party as their humble servant."

These are strong words, and bitter, but they are true, and it now remains with you and your associates to determine whether they are to be reiterated after this campaign is over, and protection has, through your apathy, been struck its death-blow. If you give us the means to win the victory we will do it. Are you willing?

Yours, very truly,

JAS. P. FOSTER, President.

Hear this friend of a pure ballot declare, "We want money, and want it at once."

Hear him quote a Republican United States Senator's declaration that he would "put the manufacturers of Pennsylvania under the fire and fry all the fat out of them."

Hear him declare, "If you give us the means to win the victory we will do it."

Money, gentlemen, money bought the election of 1888.

Mr. QUAY, the chairman of the national Republican campaign committee, adopted the suggestion of Mr. Foster. The manufacturers, not only of Pennsylvania, but of the whole country, were put "under the fire" and "the fat was fried out of them."

On this point I call as a witness Hon. John Wanamaker, the distinguished politician and statesman, who, for his knowledge of this new branch of statecraft, was made the Postmaster-General of this purchased Administration. In February, 1889, he said:

When QUAY sent for me I was surprised. I had no more idea of what he wanted with me than you might have if he telegraphed for you. But I knew he was not the kind of man to send for me unless he had important business with me, so I went. Then he told me that the national Republican committee needed money, and his scheme for my raising it. I at first declined to have anything to do with it. I had very little hope of defeating Cleveland, and still less Mrs. Cleveland, who is justly popular with the whole country, and whom I admire greatly myself, and I did not want to get on a sinking ship. He urged the matter, told me why he felt sure of carrying the election if he had the money. Even then I hesitated, and asked three weeks for consideration. He agreed, and I talked with our leading manufacturers, men whose names are the best in the land—such men as Washburne and Amos Lawrence's grandson, and a dozen others I could name—men who would never have given a dollar for dishonest uses, even if I had been willing to ask it, and at the end of the three weeks I told QUAY I would undertake to raise the money if he would allow us to establish a manufacturers' bureau and have a voice in the disposition of the money. I do not mean that we insisted on knowing what was done with every dollar of it. I did not want to know. When I sell a suit of clothes, I do not insist upon being told just where these clothes are going. My responsibility ceases when I furnish a good article at a fair price. What I did insist upon was that I should be able to satisfy the men who trusted me with their money that it was used for the purposes for which they subscribed it, and that guaranty Mr. QUAY gave me. That is how there came to be a manufacturers' bureau.

Here we have the spectacle of a man of excellent reputation engaged in a three weeks' struggle with his conscience about using his character as a collateral to raise money to corrupt the ballot and buy an election. Who can tell what wild dreams of official and social position floated before his mental vision during those three weeks? Mr. Wanamaker had been fighting the devil manfully for many years, it is said, but when the devil set QUAY on him there was no Ithuriel spear to touch the toad at his ear and show his ancient enemy in a new form. He made ignorance as to what particular crimes were committed through that money a salve to his conscience. Mr. Wanamaker had a good character before he entered politics. He disposed of it very cheap. When he quits this Cabinet and returns to his store in Philadelphia he will find in the stock to stay a splendid character badly damaged by fire.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in corroboration of Mr. Wanamaker I will introduce Col. Elliott F. Shepard, editor of the New York Mail and Express, who published the following testimony in his paper of November 22, 1888:

Of the money so liberally contributed by the Republicans in this city for election expenses, three very large sums were paid out which brought in only about 1,350 votes as the result of these expensive negotiations. The Coogan Labor vote cast for Harrison and Miller amounted to 1,200; the James O'Brien Protection Democracy vote, 50; the John J. O'Brien vote, beyond what is the normal vote in the Eighth district, to 100 votes. On Saturday before election there was paid by the national committee for use in this city to a Republican State leader, as we are informed, the great sum of about $150,000, and as none of this went to the county committee, it is fair to presume this very large sum was used in the three negotiations referred to.

The success of the Republican party in this city is to be achieved by educating the masses in Republican doctrines, by the circulation of the Republican newspapers, and the continual holding of mass-meetings; and we hope we have seen the last of attempts to buy votes en bloc, in all which attempts for the past twenty-six years we have been buying experience and not votes, been filling and trimming the lamps of our opponents and emptying our own.

Colonel Shepard evidently thinks votes sold too high; that it took too large a block of "fat" to grease such a small "block" of voters.

I know that a great many people in this country would be disposed to discredit this witness, on account of the political rabies from which he suffers, if he were not so well sustained by corroborating testimony. I propose to brace him up with one more competent witness, though it will be in the nature of cumulative testimony. The Manufacturers' Record, of Philadelphia, the organ of Mr. Wanamaker's "manufacturers' bureau," must be heard on this point. In April, 1889, when the services of patriots who contributed to the purchase of this Administration were not permitted to pass unmentioned, the Record said:

It is, therefore, to the men that give the cash that a large, if not the largest, share of success is due. These, almost always, are the business men. We make the assertion that the money contributed by this (manufacturers') club last year had more influence upon the result of the national election than all the skill, the ingenuity, the labor, and the wire-pulling of all the professional politicians in the city of Philadelphia. We believe this proposition to be capable of positive proof. If, therefore, control of patronage is rightly the reward of victorious effort, the right of this club to name the Federal office-holders of Philadelphia rests upon solid grounds. The leaders, we suppose, will claim that they are the men who win victories, and that their generalship entitles them to special consideration. But they can win no triumphs without strong backing in money and votes from the best members of their party. If the politicians had had to fight single-handed the battle of last November, Mr. Cleveland would now be in the White House. They were literally smitten with paralysis until the manufacturers and other business men came to the rescue, not only with abundant supplies of money, but with a determination to carry the day by hard work and actively exerted influence. That was how the fight was won.

The appointment of a postmaster and other important Federal officers then pending accounts for this very plain and candid claim that those who bought the victory should have control of the offices.

I do not know, but suppose, of course, that a man so eminent for his sense of justice and fair dealing as the President recognized this claim upon the fruits of the purchase.

I now come to the history, not of a contributor, but of a distributor, Hon. W. W. Dudley, better known as Blocks-of-five Dudley. The infamous "blocks-of-five letter" itself is the best evidence of the use made of the fund in Indiana. Let the letter speak for itself:

HEADQUARTERS REPUBLICAN NATIONAL COMMITTEE,
91 Fifth Avenue, New York, October 24.

[Executive Committee: M. S. Quay, chairman; J. S. Clarkson, vice-chairman; J. S. Fassett, secretary; William W. Dudley, treasurer; John C. New, A. L. Conger, G. A. Hobart, Samuel Fessenden, George R. Davis, J. Manchester Haynes, M. H. De Young, William Cassius Goodloe.]

DEAR SIR: I hope you have kept copies of the lists sent me. Such information is very valuable and should be used to great advantage. It has enabled me to demonstrate to friends that with proper assistance Indiana is surely Republican for governor and President, and has resulted, as I hoped it would, in securing for Indiana the aid necessary. Your committee will certainly receive from Chairman Huston the assistance necessary to hold our floaters and doubtful voters and gain enough of the other kind to give Harrison and Morton 10-00 plurality.

New York is now safe beyond peradventure for the Republican Presidential ticket; Connecticut likewise. In short, every Northern State, except perhaps New Jersey, though we still hope to carry that State. Harrison's majority in the electoral college will not be less than 100. Make our friends in each precinct wake up to the fact that only boodle and fraudulent votes and false counting of returns can beat us in the State. Write each of our precinct correspondents—First. To find out who has Democratic boodle, and steer the Democratic workers to them, and make them pay big prices for their own men. Second. Scan the election officers closely, and make sure to have no man on the board whose integrity is even questionable, and insist on Republicans watching every movement of the election officers. Third. See that our workers know every voter entitled to a vote, and let no one else even offer to vote. Fourth. Divide the floaters into blocks of five, and put a trusted man with necessary funds in charge of these five, and make him responsible that none get away and that all vote our ticket. Fifth. Make a personal appeal to your best business men to pledge themselves to devote the entire day, November 6, to work at the polls—that is, to be present at the polls with tickets. They will be astonished to see how utterly dumfounded the ordinary Democratic election bummer will be and how quickly he will disappear. The result will fully justify the sacrifice of time and comfort, and will be a source of satisfaction afterwards to those who help in this way. Lay great stress on this last matter. It will pay.

There will be no doubt of your receiving the necessary assistance through the national, State, and county committees; only see that it is husbanded and made to produce results. I rely on you to advise your precinct correspondents and urge them to unremitting and constant efforts from now till the polls close and the result is announced officially. We will fight for a fair election here if necessary. The rebel crew can not steal this election from us as they did in 1884 without some one getting hurt. Let every Republican do his whole duty and the country will pass into Republican hands, never to leave it, I trust. Thanking you again for your efforts to assist me in my work, I remain,

Yours, sincerely,

WM. W. DUDLEY.

Please wire me result in principal precincts and county.

It will be observed here as everywhere in this whole shameful business that the reliance for success is placed in the corrupt use of money. The greasy hand of the boodler and briber has left its mark on every page of the history of the campaign of 1888. By way of running comment on these matters, I will introduce an extract from the New York World of recent date. The World says:

President Harrison has been in power fifteen months. His Administration thus far shows that he has rewarded with high office nearly every prominent man who helped elect him. Wanamaker has been given a Cabinet portfolio. The leading Republican editors have been decorated with commissions to serve their country as foreign ministers, with the solitary exception of Dr. Murat Halstead, whose high ambition was thwarted by the Senate. Dudley, indicted for inciting to bribery in purchasing the floating vote of Indiana, has been cared for by saving him from the penitentiary. This was accomplished through the instrumentality of Judge Woods, of the district court of Indiana.

THE HERMINE AROUND THE ARCH BRIBER.

The history of this outrage on justice is as follows: Immediately after the gross election frauds of 1888 in Indiana were discovered a warrant was sworn out for Dudley's arrest, by a most reputable citizen, but Dudley absented himself for nearly a year from the State and there was no opportunity for serving it. He was an exile and a fugitive, and the officers of the United States, whose laws he had broken, made not a single effort to arrest him. Indeed, there were positive orders from Washington not to interfere with him in any way or give him the slightest inconvenience. Had he not saved Indiana and elected a Republican President? Judge Woods at one time, in one of his charges to the grand jury of Indianapolis, led the country to believe that he would do his duty in the matter; but, instructed from Washington, he positively directed the grand jury to let the blocks-of-five bribers go quit and free. Dudley about this time was threatening to use the "dynamite" he had in his possession unless the Harrison beneficiaries of his crime came to his rescue. Two more contradictory charges of a United States judge were probably never delivered in the case of any one accused of crime. Here they are, side by side:

ORIGINAL INSTRUCTION TO THE GRAND JURY.

The latter clause of the section makes any one guilty who counsels bribery. . . . This clause makes it an offense for any one to advise another to attempt to commit any of the offenses named in this section; so that, while it is not a crime to make the attempt, it is a crime to advise another to make the attempt. If A attempts to bribe B, that is no offense under this statute; but if A advises B to bribe C, then the one who commands or gives this advice is an offender under this law. And I will say that there is some wisdom in this provision.

REVISED INSTRUCTIONS.

It results, of course, that the mere sending by one to another, of a letter or document containing advice to bribe a voter, or setting forth a scheme for such bribery, however bold and reprehensible, is not indictable. There must be shown in addition an attempt by the receiver of the letter, or of some other instigated by him to execute the scheme by bribing or attempting to bribe some voter in respect to the election of Congressmen, or in such way as to affect such election.

Another point deserves consideration in this connection. If the view be adopted that advice not acted upon may constitute a crime, then the exact words used in giving the advice, whether oral or written, must be ascertained, and every possible intendment in favor of innocence must be allowed and all doubts resolved in favor of the accused. If the use of money be advised, but the particular purpose of its use be not clearly and indeed conclusively indicated, a possible innocent use will be presumed; and even if the purpose to bribe be unquestionable, and yet it appears that the design was to purchase votes for other officers than Representatives in Congress, it would be no crime under the statute which is designed to protect the election for that office.

DUDLEY GOES QUIT AND FREE.

Dudley, after an absence of more than a year, returned to Indianapolis last December. Chambers, an appointee of President Harrison, declined to arrest him, and openly defended the blocks-of-five letter.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to call attention in this connection to the fact that it is to the Federal judiciary, appointed for life, mostly Republican in politics, that we are asked by this bill to turn over the absolute control of Federal elections. I would not have it understood that I regard this judge as representative of the Federal judiciary, but, sir, I call attention to the terrible dangers that we would encounter by dragging the judiciary into politics. When the confidence of the people in the integrity of our courts is swept away, our system of government will fail, and our Constitution will be as a rope of sand to be broken or a band of steel to crush the liberties of the people.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have shown that the money to buy the election of this Congress and this Administration was raised by contributions and assessments from the allied interests of monopoly. We have the use of the money acknowledged with the claim that it carried the election for the Republican party. We have the fact that the President has recognized those who raised the fund in the distribution of his patronage. We have the evidence that the most notorious briber since the last days of the Roman Republic was granted immunity from punishment for his crimes, and it is known that he is to-day one of the most powerful factors in the management of the Pension Office, which has the distribution of nearly one-half the revenues of the Government.

The political party which conspired with these monopolies against the people and profited by this corrupt victory came into this House with a bare constitutional quorum. It elected for Speaker a man who invented "general parliamentary law," and "saw quorums" where none legally existed. This party has recognized but one god, Monopoly, and Speaker REED as his prophet. A code of rules was adopted which is binding on everybody but the Speaker; a code which stifles debate and shuts out the light of investigation and discussion, which are so essential to healthful and honest legislation.

They have made the Speaker of this House, the lower branch of Congress, one full half of the legislative machinery of the Government.

They have unseated members elected at the polls, and seated men repudiated by the people.

They have emptied the Treasury of its boasted surplus and provided for the distribution of nearly $200,000,000 annually in pensions, a sum equal to nearly one-half the entire estimated revenues of the Government.

They have prepared a way for a deficiency in the revenues of something near $100,000,000 annually. They have passed a bill raising the tariff tax on the necessities of the people in the interest of monopolies and trusts.

They have strengthened the hold of the national-banking monopoly on the volume of our currency by refusing the free coinage of silver.

Mr. Speaker, the completion of this policy, in my judgment, contemplates the issue of more bonds to meet the deficiency in revenue and the perpetuation of the national-banking system.

In the necessity for a Republican Congress to continue and to carry out this line of policy, in my opinion, lies the secret of the extraordinary pressure to pass this bill. In these things lies the real reason for its presence in this House at this time.

Mr. Speaker, any one who will consider for one moment the condition of public sentiment throughout the Union on all these questions will see that the Republican party must go out of power, and that the trusts and monopolies must account to the people for a quarter of a century of wrongs perpetrated through corrupt and class legislation, unless some measure can be fastened upon the country at this session of Congress which will sap the foundations of civil liberty and destroy the force and effect of the suffrages of the people.

Sir, in my opinion this bill conceals a worse crime against republican government and civil liberty than that for which Catiline was banished from Rome. [Applause.] I can not believe that all those who support it comprehend the full measure of the evil there is in it.

It is claimed by some, I believe by nearly all who have spoken for it, and by some who have spoken against it, that it will not go into effect in every portion of the Union. This claim alone should condemn it as an unwise and an unsafe measure. Whatever the pretext advanced for its passage, it must be known by every intelligent man that a measure not fit to be enforced in every State can not be enforced in any State without injury to the whole Union. Any measure which tends to disorganize labor, disturb society, and bring disaster to either race in the South must have its retroactive effect and produce a corresponding injury in the States which supply the commercial necessities and handle the products of the South.

I do not believe that any man of intelligence will say that this bill can be put in operation in any State in this Union without producing more or less friction, and this would more certainly occur in States where there are different races of people. I would say to gentlemen who expect to vote for this bill and inflict it on other people, while they themselves escape it, that they are deceived in the character and purpose of the measure.

It will be enforced on the petition of one hundred citizens in any city of 20,000 or more inhabitants or on the petition of fifty citizens in any Congressional district or part of a district. The purpose of its authors is to enforce it in every State. When you think of the bribes it offers to those who are employed as supervisors and deputy marshals and the opportunities it affords for political corruption you must know that the same disreputable elements which would demand its enforcement in the South will be found demanding it everywhere. The argument that it will not be generally enforced does not stand to reason. That it holds out bribes to partisans to demand its enforcement; that it is designed to promote political crimes; that it changes the manner of selecting juries, so as to give immunity from punishment for the commission of such crimes by selecting partisan juries in the Federal courts, is beyond the peradventure of a doubt.

Right here I will introduce a letter from John R. Mizell, who has been promoted to be collector of the port at Pensacola, Fla., showing what sort of administration of justice we may expect under such a bill as this. Mizell was the United States marshal for the northern district of Florida when he wrote it. It reads as follows:

OFFICE J. R. MIZELL, UNITED STATES MARSHAL FOR NORTHERN DISTRICT OF FLORIDA,
Jacksonville, Fla., July 5, 1899.

Sir: You will at once confer with McBulby and make out a list of fifty or sixty names of true and tried Republicans from your county registration list for jurors, United States court, and forward same to Hon. P. Walter, clerk United States court, and it is necessary to have them at once, as you can see. Please acknowledge this.

I am yours, truly,

JOHN R. MIZELL,
United States Marshal.

C. C. KIRK, Esq., De Land, Fla.

Please get the names of the parties as near steam-boat and railroad stations as possible.

You are asked to legalize and encourage the prostitution of the Federal courts to partisanship such as this officer practiced in Florida, and for doing so was promoted to a better office. God save the country when the courts are made engines of political oppression and the juries are selected for their partisanship. The monopolies and trusts which furnished the millions to buy the last election have embodied in this bill an idea which does great credit to their ability. They are tired of putting up their own money to buy elections.

This bill proposes to furnish an army of irresponsible Federal officials to take away the liberties of the people, and to pay the millions it will cost out of the money collected in taxes from the people. It places every dollar in the Treasury in the hands of the party in power without check or hindrance. A free ballot, for which gentlemen are so clamorous, is to be secured by invading the homes of the people before the elections and surrounding them with the hired emissaries of a political party on election day. A fair count, which is the subject of so much Republican solicitude, is to be secured by the appointment of the hired agents of a political party to do the counting regardless of the votes cast, and to certify the election of the party candidates without regard to the will of the people as expressed at the ballot-box. Gentlemen who support this measure should change their shibboleth and go to the country demanding "a corrupt ballot and a dishonest count." That is what this bill demands and is intended to secure.

Mr. Speaker, there hangs in the other end of this Capitol a picture representing the theft of the Presidency in 1876, purchased at a cost of $10,000 to the people. A cheap memorial for such a magnificent theft. That painting should be given the most conspicuous position in the Capitol, as a perpetual reminder to the American people of the frail tenure by which they hold their political liberties. This bill contains the returning-board machinery then used by the carpet-bag governments in the Southern States, which enabled the Electoral Commission to declare the election of a Republican President, and at the same time enabled the President, after he had accepted the office given him by that fraud, to recognize the Democratic State officers as the rightfully elected officers of the States, though the Democratic Presidential ticket received the same vote in those States that elected the Democratic State officials.

The people of the United States attempted to rebuke that crime in 1880, but the day of retribution was postponed for four years by the skillful and corrupt use of money in Indiana and New York, through the agency of Mr. Dorsey, who was banqueted in New York after the election and who received the thanks and commendations of the beneficiaries through a no less distinguished personage than the then Vice-President elect, Mr. Arthur.

I refer to these disgraceful chapters in history not for the purpose of indulging in useless comment or mere campaign declamation, but to show to the American people the danger to which our free institutions are exposed by a measure which proposes to throw open the doors of the Treasury to a political party and to legalize the use of every dollar in it as a political campaign fund.

Sir, we all know that money has become a most potent and dangerous factor in legislation. We know that it influences and in a large measure controls party nominations.

We know from experience in the campaigns which have occurred since legislation has built up and enriched so many monopolies that money has in a great degree corrupted politics in all the great cities of the country. We know that it has in a greater or a less degree corrupted all political organizations. We have seen that men counted respectable otherwise have come to regard votes and offices as mere articles of merchandise, and that the Republican party especially has never hesitated to wield any power or to use any means in its reach to accomplish its purpose. It is indeed insane in its greed for power when it supports such a measure as this.

Knowing these facts it seems to me little short of criminal to even propose much less to vote for a measure which places an immense army of partisans at the command of the party in power to perpetuate its rule, and places every dollar in the Treasury at its command as a campaign fund out of which to reward party workers. Let me repeat it, Mr. Speaker, to emphasize it and impress it on the mind of every American citizen, this bill gives the party in power the right to use under the forms of law every dollar in the Treasury as a campaign or corruption fund to buy or control the elections for Congress and for President.

I would not trust such power in the hands of any political organization that ever existed under the sun. Sir, I would as soon vote to elect a king to rule over the American people as to vote for this bill. No free people will tolerate such a measure. No people can live under such a law as this bill proposes and be free. Any people who would tolerate such a law do not deserve to be free. I believe that the deliberate purpose of this bill is the complete revolution of this Government.

The time has come when it is a fight to the death between the people and the monopolies. The monopolies have determined by this bill to repress what Mr. Hamilton termed "the turbulent spirit of democracy," and to force the Government into channels from which there will be no escape from centralization and death to free institutions.

Sir, this bill was conceived, as I have stated, in a meeting of the representatives of monopoly assembled at Pittsburgh, Pa. Its coming was heralded to the country by the Speaker of this House in that meeting. It was born of a Republican caucus in this House under a Cæsarian operation. It has concealed in its provisions a dagger aimed at the vitals of the Republic. It will "die the death."

And go down
To the vile dust from whence it sprang,
Unwept, unhonored, and unsung.

Its reputed father, who was deceived even in its conception, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and its anxious and proud wet-nurse, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL], and its most puissant and bold god-father and accoucher [Mr. Speaker REED] will after its death apostrophize the political lust in which it was conceived in the language of Sir Philip Sidney:

Thou blind man's mark, thou fool's self-snare,
Fond fancy's scum, and dregs of scattered thought;
Bond of all evils, cradle of causeless care,
Thou web of ill, whose end is never wrought.

[Great applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GEISSENHAINER. Mr. Speaker, when Cromwell walked into Parliament, proclaimed himself dictator, and overturned legislation, he probably caused not one degree more confusion than will be occasioned this Government from the operation of the bill under consideration.

The right to vote is bestowed upon no one under the Constitution. It is neither a privilege nor immunity of citizens of the United States. Congress has not adopted the election and registration laws of any State. (Norton vs. Brewster, 23 F. R., 840.)

The fifteenth amendment, forbidding the denial or abridgment by the Federal or State governments of the right of suffrage on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, did not confer the right of suffrage, but annulled all existing provisions of State constitutions which limited this right to white persons. (United States vs. Reese, 92 U. S., 214; Neal vs. Delaware, 103 id., 370; United States vs. Amsden, 10 Biss., 283; United States vs. Crosby, 1 Hughes, 448.)

Section 2004, Revised Statutes: The right to vote in the States is a right derived from the States themselves, and has not been granted or secured by the Federal Constitution; but the right of exemption from the prohibited discrimination in the exercise of the elective franchise is derived from the Constitution of the United States, and has been both secured and granted by it. Notwithstanding section 2004, the several States have the power to deny the right of suffrage to any citizens of the United States on account of age, sex, place of birth, vocation, want of property, intelligence, neglect of civic duties, crime, or other cause not specified in the amendment. (McKay vs. Campbell, 1 Sawyer, 374.)

The elective franchise is to be considered as the most sacred privilege of citizenship. Its honest exercise is to be regarded as the great safeguard of society, and the States of our Union are endeavoring, by the enacting of various systems of ballot reform, to protect their citizens in their just rights, and do not require the intervention of further Government aid.

The present bill, in more instances than one, will conflict with the operation of the State ballot laws, and instead of protecting the voter, seems, Mr. Speaker, to do directly the opposite.

It places in the hands of the chief supervisor of each State the power to employ a numerous detail of assistants, whose presence may not only intimidate and confuse the voter, and thus prevent a fair election, but whose very appointment may be a violation of section 38 of this bill.

A returning board, too, is established, clothed with the power, irrespective of the ballots cast, and without consideration of the State law in regard to the marking and printing of ballots, to certify to the Clerk of the House of Representatives the election of a candidate for Congress, who may have received, not only the smallest number of votes cast, but whose ballots may have been deposited in the ballot-box in direct violation of State law, and have therefore been properly denied consideration by the State inspectors of election.

In certain States where the law provides that the names of all candidates are to be printed upon one ballot most disastrous results may be anticipated from the right to hold the ballot-boxes, as permitted by section 34.

There are certain features about this bill which, like the tariff bill, appear to discriminate very peculiarly.

By paragraph 3 of section 2, one hundred persons or fifty persons, according to the population, who may not be citizens of the United States, but simply claim so to be, may petition for a supervision of election, and an unlimited number of persons by the repeal of section 2028 of the Revised Statutes may be appointed as special deputy marshals, although not qualified voters in the voting precinct in which the duties are to be performed.

It may not be ill-timed to cast a cursory glance at officers provided by this bill, and the emoluments of the same.

First. The chief supervisors, who hold office during good behavior. They are paid by fees, as follows: Filing returns, etc., 10 cents; affixing seal, etc., 20 cents; entering record, etc., 15 cents per folio; arranging and transmitting reports, etc., to Congress, 15 cents per folio; administering oath to supervisors and special deputy marshals, 10 cents; and for certifying same, 15 cents, which fees, though small in themselves, aggregate very large amounts.

Second. Supervisors of election in cities of 100,000 and upwards are to receive $10 for election day and $5 a day for eleven days more.

In other places where there is registration, these officials are to be paid $5 a day for six days, and where there is no registration $5 a day for three days. There are to be three supervisors of election for each election district, two of whom only shall be of the same political party.

Third. An unlimited number of special deputy marshals may be appointed by the marshal and chief supervisor, whose pay is to be $5 a day for eight days.

Fourth. Three canvassers for each State are appointed by the judge of the circuit court, not more than two of whom shall belong to the same political party and hold office so long as faithful and capable.

The compensation of these is $15 a day for fifteen days, and $5 a day for personal expenses. These canvassers are provided with a clerk who is to receive $12 a day for services and expenses.

When we consider the great number of election districts in this country and the unbounded power of appointment, we can not but think that a most unjust and unnecessary tax will be levied upon the people.

There are in the States of this Union upwards of 60,000 election districts, as follows:

Alabama.....	1,100	Florida.....	600
Arkansas.....	1,275	Georgia.....	800
California.....	1,763	Illinois.....	4,000
Colorado.....	2,500	Indiana.....	1,857
Connecticut.....	301	Iowa.....	1,950
Delaware.....	66	Kansas.....	8,000

Kentucky.....	1,871	North Dakota.....	709
Louisiana.....	744	Ohio.....	2,449
Maine.....	504	Oregon.....	510
Maryland.....	483	Pennsylvania.....	4,500
Massachusetts.....	715	Rhode Island.....	51
Michigan.....	1,514	South Carolina.....	583
Minnesota.....	1,600	South Dakota.....	2,000
Mississippi.....	888	Tennessee.....	1,930
Missouri.....	2,500	Texas.....	2,935
Montana.....	431	Vermont.....	247
Nebraska.....	1,500	Virginia.....	1,500
Nevada.....	150	Washington.....	545
New Hampshire.....	267	West Virginia.....	1,080
New Jersey.....	713	Wisconsin.....	1,600
New York.....	3,596
North Carolina.....	1,113	Total.....	57,900

These figures have been obtained from the officials of the various States, and are presumably correct.

It is estimated that the cost of holding each election, under the provisions of this bill, would not be less than $10,000,000.

The patronage in the hands of the dominant party would be enormous, and the dangers arising therefrom might lead to the greatest corruption.

The bill will bring no relief to that section of the country for which it is said to have been especially prepared, but, on the contrary, it will tend to intensify race prejudices and engender sectional hostility.

Does this bill intend, first, to secure the control of the South and, secondly, to intimidate Democrats in all Northern Democratic strongholds? Is it framed, not on the principles on which our Government was founded; not in accordance with a Government for and by the people, but to coerce them, by a proffer of Federal appointments, to a change of political sentiment?

Was it the object of the framers of this bill, in creating the large number of officials, to provide places for such workers and members of the G. O. P. as the present Administration had failed to find "holes" to stick these "pegs" in? The bill in its title proposes "to amend and supplement the election laws and to provide for other purposes."

Is this one of the "other purposes?"

How is it, Mr. Speaker, that the majority in this House, having acted under a Federal election law, framed by their own party in 1871, have at this late day discovered that it is defective and now desire a change? And how is it that under this bill they now seek to repeal the safeguards contained in the present law, and to substitute therefor such measures as are calculated to retain in the hands of the dominant party the control of the House of Representatives? [Applause.]

[Mr. GOODNIGHT withholds his remarks for revision. See Appendix.]

And then, on motion of Mr. COLEMAN (at 11 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PETTIGREW, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 789) opening to settlement a portion of the Fort Randall military reservation in South Dakota, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. TELLER. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1331) to amend section 11 of an act entitled "An act to enable the people of Colorado to form a State constitution and State government, for the admission of the said State into the Union on equal footing with the original States," to report it with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed. This report is made because the Department of the Interior has determined that the State is entitled to the relief sought in the bill without the passage of an act by Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WALTHALL, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10639) to amend section 2, act of May 30, 1862, reported it with amendments.

Mr. GEORGE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 62) to define trusts, and to provide for the punishment of persons engaged in their creation or in carrying them out, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom were referred the following bills, reported adversely thereon; and the bills were severally postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 3797) for the repayment of purchase-money in certain cases;

A bill (S. 3939) to abolish landlordism, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. 2362) to provide for commutation of timber-culture entries;

A bill (S. 2168) requiring the Secretary of the Interior to cause patents to be issued at once for all lands entered under the homestead, pre-emption, or timber-culture laws, where final proof was made prior to January 1, 1889, and an innocent third party has acquired an interest in said land by deed, mortgage, or otherwise; and

A bill (S. 1425) to open abandoned military reservations in the State of South Dakota to homestead entry.

He also, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. 4171) to authorize the leasing of school lands in the Territory of Oklahoma, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. PLUMB. I give notice that I will ask the Senate at the very first moment, some time to-day or early to-morrow, to consider this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred an amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. CALL to the bill (S. 2781) for the purchase of a historical book of reference from Austin & Co., reported it without amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported favorably an amendment offered by himself June 25, concerning the trust fund of the Chickasaw Nation, intended to be proposed to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. From the Committee on Territories I report favorably without amendment the bill (S. 4165) to authorize the board of supervisors of Maricopa County, Arizona, to issue certain bonds in aid of the construction of a certain railroad.

Mr. STEWART. There has been no meeting of the Committee on Territories since that bill was introduced. It has not been considered by the committee, and I object to the report being made without a meeting of the committee.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I am directed by a majority of the committee to make the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. PLATT. I desire to say that I do not concur in the report which has just been made with reference to the Maricopa County bonds.

STATUTES AT LARGE FOR SENATE LIBRARY.

Mr. EVARTS. I am instructed by the Library Committee to report favorably without amendment a resolution of the Senate that I ask may be considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, submitted by Mr. GRAY April 23, 1890, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to furnish the library of the Senate with 50 copies of volume 20 of the Statutes at Large of the United States.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator who reported the resolution whether those copies are for distribution.

Mr. EVARTS. No; for the use of the Senate in the library.

The resolution was agreed to.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE COX.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, I ask leave to make a statement. I am desired by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], who is detained by illness and will be unable to attend in the Senate to-morrow, he desiring to take a part in the commemorative addresses on the occasion of the decease of my late colleague, Mr. Cox, to request that, as he will be unable to attend, owing to his illness, for a week, a postponement may be made. I concur in that wish, and therefore announce that on Tuesday of next week at 3 o'clock I shall call up the communication from the other House.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 4172) for the relief of Paul Gregory; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. McMILLAN, Mr. PLATT, and Mr. SPOONER submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING-PRESSES OF BUREAU OF ENGRAVING AND PRINTING.

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate, as soon as may be, with all the information in his possession as to—

First. The number of hand plate-printing presses purchased or ordered for use in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing since April 1, 1889, and the amount of their total cost, together with the stoves and other things that go with them in order to make them complete.

Second. The number of hand plate-printing presses that have been repaired and put in order since April 1, 1889, and the cost of putting them in repair, together with the stoves and other belongings.

Third. The number of hand roller-presses that have been put in use since the 30th of June, 1889, to take the place of the nineteen steam plate-printing presses then in use and the total cost of these hand-presses and their fixings, including the stoves.

Fourth. The amount of extra time or overtime worked by other employes in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing than the plate-printer, and the total amount paid for such overwork since the 30th of June, 1889, up to date, and the amount estimated from date to June 30, 1890.

Fifth. The number of merchantable impressions printed in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing on steel-plate printing-presses from the 1st of July, 1889, to June 30, 1890, both dates inclusive, and the cost of printing, i. e., the wages paid the plate-printers, their assistants, superintendents, etc.

Sixth. The number of merchantable impressions printed in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing on steel-plate presses from July 1, 1889, to June 30, 1890, both dates inclusive, and the cost of printing the same, including the items specified in the preceding paragraph.

ADMISSION OF IDAHO.

Mr. DAWES. I present a conference report on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would state to the Senator from Massachusetts that the message has not yet come from the House of Representatives, and therefore the report is not in order at this time, the bill and papers being in the possession of the other House.

Mr. PLATT. If that be so, I ask that the Senate take up the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the unfinished business by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 658) to provide for the admission of the State of Idaho into the Union.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota rise to morning business?

Mr. DAVIS. I do not. I wish to appeal to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. PLATT. Let me get the Idaho bill before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, if there be no objection.

Mr. PLATT. The bill (H. R. 4562) to provide for the admission of the State of Idaho into the Union was passed by the House of Representatives and is now lying on the table of the Senate. There is no important difference between the two bills. I ask that House bill 4562 may be substituted for the Senate bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 4562) to provide for the admission of the State of Idaho into the Union may be substituted for and take the place of the bill of the Senate on the same subject, the title of which has been read, as the unfinished business. Is there objection?

Mr. GORMAN. I notice that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] is now present, and I ask that the question be again stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the House bill for the admission of Idaho may be substituted for and take the place of the Senate bill on the same subject, the same being the unfinished business.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. As far as I am concerned, Mr. President, I have no objection to that course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill (H. R. 4562) to provide for the admission of the State of Idaho into the Union is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and will be read at length.

OATHS IN SOLDIERS' CLAIMS.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the Senator from Connecticut to give way for a moment to allow me to move for the present consideration of House bill 578.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield?

Mr. PLATT. I will until I hear what the bill is.

Mr. DAVIS. It is the bill (H. R. 578) in relation to oaths in pension and other cases.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the unfinished business being temporarily laid aside? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 578) in relation to oaths in pensions and other cases; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any and all affidavits and declarations to be hereafter made or used in any pension or bounty cases or in claims against the Government for back pay or arrears or increase of pension, or for quarterly vouchers, may be taken by any officer authorized to administer oaths for general purposes in the State, city, or county where said officer resides. If such officer has a seal and uses it upon such paper, no certificate of a county clerk, or prothonotary, or clerk of a court shall be necessary; but when no seal is used by the officer taking such affidavit, then a clerk of a court of record, or a county or city clerk, shall affix his official seal thereto, and shall certify to the signature and official character of said officer.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9066) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, and for other purposes.

JOHN E. WALTON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2076) granting an increase of pension to John E. Walton, which was, in line 5, to strike out "fifty" and insert "forty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John E. Walton, late of Company C, One hundredth Pennsylvania Volunteers, and pay him at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of the pension he is now receiving under certificate numbered 176641.

Mr. PIERCE. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Dakota that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

ADMISSION OF IDAHO.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4562) to provide for the admission of the State of Idaho into the Union.

Mr. PLATT. Now let the bill be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length, as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. PLATT. I ask that the report may be read. The report proper is short. I desire that it follow the bill in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the report.

Mr. MORRILL. It will be remembered that when the tariff bill was reported notice was given that it would not be called up until today. I understand there are several conference reports on general appropriation bills that will be pending to-day and perhaps an appropriation bill to be reported. This being the last day of the fiscal year, I do not intend to interfere at all with any such business, and give notice that at the earliest practicable moment the tariff bill will be called up.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Vermont whether he expects to call up the tariff bill before a week from to-day for discussion.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope to do so. I think it is very important that we get that bill through the Senate early.

Mr. PLATT. I desire to say that I can not consent to any suggestion that interferes with the order of business, which is now under consideration, and much as I believe in the tariff bill and as anxious as I am to see it passed, I do not think it can be taken up until the consideration of the Idaho bill is concluded.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I should like the attention of the Senator from Vermont a moment. I did not hear distinctly what the Senator from Vermont said. I desire to say that we have now no understanding as to the order of business in the Senate such as is usual, and I think it would facilitate the public business very much if the Senator would fix a time some few days hence when the tariff bill can be considered, subject of course to the pending bill and the appropriation bills. It would add very much to the convenience of those of us on this side of the Chamber who desire to have something to say about that bill; and if the Senate would fix a day in the latter part of this week, or at the beginning of the next, subject of course to the pending bill—the Idaho bill—and the appropriation bills.

Mr. MORRILL. I have already stated that it was not the purpose to interfere with the appropriation bills or with conference reports, but that at as early a moment as practicable the tariff bill would be called up.

Mr. TELLER. I would suggest to the Senator from Maryland that it is not possible to call up the tariff bill this week. I do not think anybody need expect that. We shall probably adjourn over from Thursday until Monday, and I have no doubt this bill with the appropriation bills will take more time than that. We probably shall not get through the Idaho bill this week.

Mr. PLATT. Oh, yes.

Mr. TELLER. I doubt it.

Mr. PLATT. We ought to get through the Idaho bill to-morrow.

Mr. TELLER. That, of course, will depend on the appropriation bills.

Mr. REAGAN. I desired to submit some remarks this morning on the subject of Senate bill 1642, in relation to the free zone of Northern Mexico, but, if it is not agreeable to the Senator from Connecticut for me to do so now, I desire to give notice that to-morrow morning after the morning hour I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate to submit some remarks on that bill, which I regard as one of very great importance and which should receive the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. PLATT. I wish the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] would give me his attention. The Idaho bill having been read, I desire that the report which was made in the Idaho case, and which is only four pages, shall be read, so that it can go in the RECORD in connection with the bill, and then I desire to have the memorial of the constitutional convention, which has not yet been printed, go in the RECORD with the constitution. It will not be necessary to read those, but it will make up a connected case in the RECORD.

Mr. ALLISON. Let them all go in the RECORD without reading.

Mr. PLATT. I am quite willing, if unanimous consent is given, that the memorial and the other papers shall be placed in the RECORD without reading.

Mr. DAWES. I will state to the Senator from Connecticut that I have delayed calling up the conference report on the legislative appropriation bill because of a difference between the record of proceedings in the other House and the message which has already been received here. That difference is quite essential in parliamentary proceedings. I have sent back to see which is correct, and therefore I am not in the Senator's way.

Mr. PLATT. Then I ask that the report may be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. PLATT from the Committee on Territories February 18, 1890, but before concluding was interrupted by

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the report may be printed in the RECORD without reading the rest of it, and that the memorial of the members of the constitutional convention of Idaho praying for admission under the constitution may also be printed in the RECORD without reading, and also the constitution adopted by the convention held at Boise City. It is scarcely worth while to take the time of the Senate in reading these long documents through, and I presume there will be no objection to inserting them in the RECORD. That will make a connected case for the admission of the State.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I scarcely see the necessity of those documents being printed in the RECORD unless they are read, because they have been printed in document form and are in the hands of members of the Senate. I am rather inclined to think that the memorial ought to be read, but I hardly see the necessity for the constitution going into the RECORD at all. I imagine everybody has read it who takes any interest in the subject.

Mr. PLATT. Does the Senator desire that the reading of the report shall be concluded? It is, perhaps, half read through.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not think it is of any use to read either of them, unless possibly it may be the memorial. It just fills up the RECORD, and Senators have copies of them.

Mr. PLATT. I will not ask to have the constitution printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Connecticut, that the remainder of the report may be printed in the RECORD, and also the memorial?

Mr. BUTLER. I think the report of the committee ought to be printed in the RECORD, and I think that the memorial ought to be printed. They both contain information important to the Senate and to the country.

Mr. PLATT. Very well. I withdraw my request.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Some Senators desire to hear the memorial read.

Mr. BUTLER. I trust the Senator from Connecticut will not withdraw his request to print the memorial in the RECORD. I see no objection to that.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Unless some Senator wishes it read I will not insist upon it, but the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] said he would like to hear the memorial read. So far as I am concerned, I am willing that the remainder of the report may be printed and that the memorial be read and that the constitution shall not be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. PLATT. I will then simply ask that the reading of the rest of the report may be omitted, and that the memorial may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the remainder of the report will not be read, but the whole document will be printed in the RECORD.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. 656) entitled "A bill to provide for the admission of the State of Idaho into the Union," together with the memorial of the people of the Territory of Idaho, praying for the admission of that Territory as a State, having considered the same, respectfully submit the following report:

Idaho was organized as a Territory March 3, 1863, with an area of 323,000 square miles. In 1868, by the creation of the Territories of Montana and Wyoming, its area was reduced to its present size. Its settlement, growth, and development, at first slow, have recently become rapid and substantial, so much so that the foundations of a rich and prosperous commonwealth are already laid.

In the last Congress a bill was reported by the Senate Committee on Territories authorizing the people of the Territory of Idaho to hold a convention for the purpose of framing a constitution and to submit the same to Congress if ratified by a vote of the people of the Territory. Pressure of business prevented action by the Senate upon this bill.

After the adjournment of Congress, Governor E. A. Stevenson issued a proclamation recommending that the people of the Territory should elect delegates to a convention to be held at Boise City on the 4th day of July, 1889, to frame a constitution for the State of Idaho. Governor Stevenson was succeeded in office by Governor George L. Shoup, who assumed the duties of the office on the 1st day of May, 1889. On the 11th day of May, Governor Shoup issued a supplementary proclamation indorsing the recommendations made by Governor Stevenson.

In pursuance of these proclamations an election was held, and seventy-two delegates were chosen to the convention. About sixty delegates appeared on the day named for holding the convention, and during the progress of the convention all but three of the delegates were present and took part in its deliberations. The convention was in session thirty-four days. Its proceedings were characterized by harmony and non-partisanship, and it framed a constitution of which a copy is hereto appended. (Appendix A.)

This constitution was submitted to a vote of the people of the Territory of Idaho, for adoption or rejection, at a special election called by proclamation of the governor, in pursuance of an ordinance adopted by the convention on the 8th day of November, 1889. At this election the constitution was ratified by a vote of 12,398 in favor of the constitution to 1,733 votes against it, 13 votes being returned as scattering—a total vote of 14,131.

The people of the Territory, in their memorial to Congress, pray that Idaho may be admitted as a State in the Union under the constitution thus framed and ratified by the people.

An examination of the constitution adopted shows it to be republican in form, in harmony with the principles of our Government, well adapted to the wants of its people, and wise in its recognition of progressive ideas. Shall the prayer of the people be granted and Idaho added without delay to the Union of States?

In the opinion of the committee, the answer to this question should be in the affirmative. A Territorial government precedes, and is in itself a pledge of statehood. When the time comes in the history of a Territory when the number and character of its people, its resources, and prospects of development are such as to satisfy Congress that statehood, if conferred, will result in wise and beneficent government, easily and gladly sustained, there should be no hesitation about admission.

It is the opinion of the committee that Idaho fulfills these conditions. Its population, though it is now probably less than the unit of representation in the House of Representatives, is of a character that can be relied upon to maintain a State government according to its wisely guarded constitution. Its inhabitants, drawn chiefly from the older States, are imbued with a just idea of the duties and responsibilities of citizenship, and ardently desire an opportunity to exercise the same rights which as citizens they have hitherto enjoyed in these States. The population is steadily and rapidly increasing, and the material resources of the Territory are such as to make it certain that a steady growth of population will be sustained.

No census having been taken since 1880, the number of inhabitants can only be estimated. Governor Shoup estimated it last year at 117,235, which, in the opinion of the committee, is a conservative estimate. The present rapid development of the Territory warrants the belief that within the first year after admission the population of the State would be at least 150,000.

The area of the Territory of Idaho is 86,234 square miles, or 55,223,160 acres. It extends from the British possessions on the north to Utah and Nevada on the south; from Montana and Wyoming on the east to Washington and Oregon on the west, having a length from north to south of about 410 miles, and varying in width from 41 to 306 miles.

Its agricultural lands are estimated at 16,000,000 acres, or about 25,500 square miles; its forest lands at 10,000,000 acres, its grazing and mineral lands at 30,000,000 acres, leaving about 8,000,000 acres of mountainous land and about 1,300,000 acres covered by lakes and rivers.

In Northern Idaho the land does not, for the greater part, require irrigation. In Southern Idaho irrigation is required and is easily supplied, and when irrigated the land is exceedingly fertile and productive. The surveyor-general of the Territory reports 240,000 acres reclaimed and in process of reclamation. But Idaho will not be dependent on a single industry. Its forests, its mines, and its grazing lands supplement its agricultural resources.

The value of live-stock in the Territory is estimated at over $11,000,000. The output of gold, silver, and lead amounted last year to $17,340,000; and since 1862 the production of minerals has reached the enormous total of $157,720,962. Of its capacity to produce lumber, Governor Shoup, in his annual report to the Secretary of the Interior, says:

"The quantity of timber in the Territory, when reduced to feet, is beyond calculation, and if properly protected will produce sufficient lumber and fuel for this and neighboring States and Territories for hundreds of years to come."

The assessed value of property in the Territory is about $25,000,000. This does not include mining property nor lands entered upon but not yet patented. The actual value of property in the Territory is estimated at $65,000,000.

It has 18 counties organized, 385 school districts, 24,071 children of school age, and school property valued at $344,300. It has a system of public schools, and is thoroughly earnest in the progressive education of its children. It has built a capitol building at a cost of $100,000, an insane asylum at a cost of $50,000, has located and begun work on a university, all without the aid of the General Government. Its annual Territorial and county expenses are $533,000, of which the General Government pays only $23,000. The bonded indebtedness of the Territory is $146,000. On the 1st day of January it had sufficient money to pay all its floating indebtedness and leave a balance in the treasury of about $60,000.

The foregoing brief and imperfect statement of the extent and the resources of the Territory of Idaho and of the efforts of its people for development must satisfy all impartial minds that Idaho may be safely admitted as a State. The bill which has been considered by the committee is similar to the enabling act reported by the committee at the last session of Congress in its provisions relating to the disposition of public lands and courts. And the convention heretofore referred to, in framing its constitution, complied with the provisions of the act as to the compact between the proposed State and the United States.

Section 3 of Article VI of the proposed constitution is as follows:

"No person is permitted to vote, serve as a juror, or hold any civil office who is under guardianship, idiotic, or insane, or who has at any place been convicted of treason, felony, embezzlement of the public funds, bartering or selling or offering to barter or sell his vote, or purchasing or offering to purchase the vote of another, or other infamous crime, and who has not been restored to the rights of citizenship; or who, at the time of such election, is confined in prison on conviction of a criminal offense; or who is a bigamist or polygamist, or is living in what is known as patriarchal, plural, or celestial marriage, or in violation of any law of this State or of the United States forbidding any such crime; or who, in any manner, teaches, advises, counsels, aids, or encourages any person to enter into bigamy, polygamy, or such patriarchal, plural, or celestial marriage, or to live in violation of any such law, or to commit any such crime; or who is a member of or contributes to the support, aid, or encouragement of any order, organization, association, corporation, or society, which teaches, advises, consents, encourages, or aids any person to enter into bigamy, polygamy, or such patriarchal or plural marriage, or which teaches or advises that the laws of this State prescribing rules of civil conduct are not the supreme law of the State; nor shall Chinese or persons of Mongolian descent, not born in the United States, nor Indians, not taxed, who have not severed their tribal relations and adopted the habits of civilization, either vote, serve as jurors, or hold any civil office."

Strenuous opposition was made to the admission of Idaho under its proposed constitution by the representatives of the Mormons residing in said Territory because of the section above quoted. About 20,000 Mormons reside in Idaho Territory, mostly in the four southeastern counties. They were represented before the committee by counsel and by Mr. William Budgo, a bishop of the Mormon Church and president of what is known as "A Stake" in Idaho. The section of the constitution referred to is copied from the Territorial law requiring a test oath to be taken by voters in the Territory in order to entitle them to vote. A claim was made in the Territorial court that the law which made the right to vote depend upon an oath to be taken by the applicant, denying his connection with the practices and organizations and associations referred to in section 3 as aforesaid, was contrary to the Constitution of the United States. In the Territorial court the constitutionality of such law was affirmed; the case was appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, and has been argued and decided since the bill under consideration has been pending before the committee. The unanimous decision of the Supreme Court sustained the constitutionality of the law. The opinion, delivered by Judge Field, is appended to this report, marked Appendix B.

The committee sees nothing in the section in the proposed constitution above quoted which should prevent the admission of the State. If any of the citizens of Idaho are bigamists or polygamists or are living in violation of any law of the State or United States passed for the prevention of bigamy or polygamy, a sense of justice and a regard for the good order of the State require that they should be excluded from exercising a control in its organization and conduct. So, if they belong to and support and aid or encourage any association which teaches and advises and aids persons to be bigamists and polygamists, or which sets up an obligation to such association above the law of the State, they ought to be excluded.

No persons will be excluded from the privilege of voting, holding office, or serving as a juror, by the constitution of Idaho, unless they are in fact bigamists or polygamists, or are advising, counseling, aiding, or encouraging such crimes, or unless membership in the Mormon Church brings them within the prohibitions of the proposed constitution. This is a question of fact to be determined by the courts, and when it shall appear to the courts that bigamy and polygamy have ceased, and that the Mormon Church no longer enjoins or encourages or advises persons to enter into such relations and no longer puts allegiance to the church higher than allegiance to the State, nobody will for such reasons be disfranchised or excluded from the right to hold office by the constitution of Idaho. Until such time arrives, the committee believe that exclusion upon such grounds is both justifiable and necessary.

It is the conclusion of the committee that Idaho's right to admission is full and complete. Some verbal and formal amendments to the bill are suggested, and so amended the committee recommend that the bill do pass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will now be read.
The Secretary read as follows:

MEMORIAL.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

Your memorialists, the people of the Territory of Idaho, through their representatives in convention assembled, respectfully represent:

That for more than twenty-six years last past, under a Territorial organization, we have cheerfully yielded obedience to the Constitution and laws of the United States, and have recognized to its fullest extent the right of Congress to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territory.

That disclaiming any disloyal feeling in any manner toward the General Government, but asserting our fealty to and veneration for the Constitution of the United States, we are mindful of the undisputed right of the people of any section of our common country peacefully to assemble and represent by petition their grievances to Congress, and in this spirit we respectfully represent:

That in our opinion the present system of Territorial government is unrepugnant and undemocratic in theory, and in practice deprives vast numbers of loyal, peaceable, and patriotic American citizens of the right of self-government;

That under it strangers to our wants, interests, and requirements are sent among us to fill all the principal offices; and the life, liberty, and property of our people intrusted to the hands of officials in whose selection we have had no voice;

That such a system and policy is wholly unsuited to our present condition and works to a disadvantage by retarding the development of our growing and diversified interests;

That since the advent of railroads, connecting our Territory with all points of the compass, our population and resources have been largely augmented and increased, rendering a more perfect system of government in accord with the spirit of American institutions a paramount necessity to our people;

Therefore, in order to enlarge our liberties and place us upon a level with the citizens of our common country in the full enjoyment of all the rights, privileges, and immunities of American citizenship,

Your memorialists, with the approbation and at the request of the people of Idaho, have met in convention and formed a constitution, republican in form, for the State of Idaho, and herewith present a certified copy thereof for your consideration and approval; and if, upon an examination thereof, you find the same unobjectionable in substance and in form, your memorialists earnestly pray that the Territory of Idaho may be speedily admitted into the Union thereunder; and your memorialists will ever pray.

Done in open convention at Boise City, Territory of Idaho, this 6th day of August, A. D. 1889.

By the governor:

GEO. L. SHOUP.

E. J. CURTIS,
Secretary of Idaho.

Mr. PLATT. Let the names be printed in the RECORD without reading. They are the names of the members of the constitutional convention.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, in the absence of objection.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PLUMB. I now ask that the pending order, the bill for the admission of Idaho, be laid aside temporarily, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 10716, being the agricultural appropriation bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 10716) making appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for fiscal year ending June 30, A. D. 1891.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill. If there be no objection, the amendments reported by the Committee on Appropriations will be acted upon as they are reached in reading the text of the bill. The Chair hears no objection, and that order will be pursued.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Department of Agriculture, office of the Secretary," on page 2, line 10, before the word "clerks," to strike out "two" and insert "three;" and in line 11, after the word "four," to strike out "three thousand six" and insert "five thousand four;" so as to read:

Three clerks of class 4, $5,400,

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 25, to increase the total amount of the appropriations for compensation of the Secretary of Agriculture, Assistant Secretary, and the clerks and employes in the office of the Secretary from $78,700 to $80,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for "document and folding room," on page 6, line 22, before the word "hundred," to strike out "four" and insert "six;" in the same line, after the word "two," to strike out "clerks" and insert "chief folders;" and in line 1, on page 7, before the word "hundred," to strike out "two" and insert "four;" so as to make the clause read:

Document and folding room: One superintendent, $1,600; 2 chief folders at $1,000 each, $2,000; 1 clerk, $600; 6 folders at $600 each, $3,600; 1 laborer, $600; in all, $5,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 5, after the word "herbarium," to insert "and for labor in preparing the same;" in line 9, after the word "plants," to insert "including cost of reports and illustrations thereof;" and after the word "local," at the end of line 11, to strike out "botanist" and insert "botanists;" so as to make the clause read:

Botanical investigations and experiments, division of botany: Purchasing specimens, paper, and all necessary materials for the herbarium and for labor in preparing the same, and for investigations and experiments with graminæ and forage plants, including the establishment and maintenance of experimental grass stations, and of other economic and medical plants, including cost of reports and illustrations thereof, and for traveling and other necessary expenses connected therewith, and for employing local botanists in the field for exploration and collection of plants in little known districts, $40,000; and the unexpended balance of appropriations under this head for the current fiscal year is hereby reappropriated and made available for the fiscal year 1891.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 23, after the word "traveling," to insert "within the United States;" so as to make the clause read:

Investigating the history and habits of insects, division of entomology: Promotion of economic entomology; investigating the history and habits of insects injurious and beneficial to agriculture, arboriculture, and horticulture; experiments in ascertaining the best means of destroying them; publishing reports thereon, and for illustrations, chemicals, traveling within the United States, and other expenses in the practical work of the Division of Entomology, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, line 9, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty" and insert "twenty-five;" so as to read:

Silk section, sericulture: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to collect and disseminate information relating to silk culture; to purchase and distribute silk-worm eggs and mulberry trees; and conduct at some point in the District of Columbia experiments with automatic machinery for reeling silk from the cocoon, and to pay expenses incurred in collecting, purchasing, preparing for transportation, and transporting the cocoons used in these experiments, and to pay the expenses of stations connected with said section, and necessary traveling expenses, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] to the language in line 11, on page 9, where the bill reads:

The Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to sell in open market any all reeled silk.

Mr. PLUMB. The word "and" should be inserted after the word "any;" so as to read "any and all reeled silk."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made in the absence of objection. The Chair hears none.

The reading of the bill was continued. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 10, line 2, before the word "thousand," to strike out "ten" and insert "fifteen;" so as to make the clause read:

Division of ornithology and mammalogy: For investigating the geographic distribution of animals and plants, and for the promotion of economic ornithology and mammalogy, and investigation of the food-habit of North American birds and mammals in relation to agriculture, horticulture, and forestry; for publishing reports thereon, and for illustrations, field-work, traveling and other expenses in the practical work of the division, $15,000, of which sum $1,000 may be applied on account of expenses incurred during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1890.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, at the beginning of line 10, to strike out "Investigation of food adulterations and;" in line 14, after the word "expenses," to strike out "the purchase of food samples and condiments in the investigation of the adulteration of food;" and in line 18, before the word "thousand," to strike out "five" and insert "three;" so as to make the clause read:

Investigations and experiments relating to textile fibers, division of microscopy: Microscopical apparatus, chemicals, photographic illustrations and drawings and other necessary supplies; traveling expenses; the purchase of textile fibers, and ascertaining their relative strength and forms, and for experiments in decorticating and cleansing fibers, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 6, after the word "forestry," to insert "and for experiments in the production of rainfall;" and in line 9, before the word "thousand," to strike out "eight" and insert "ten;" so as to make the clause read:

Report on forestry—division of forestry: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture are to experiment and continue an investigation and report upon the subject of forestry, and for experiments in the production of rainfall, and for traveling and other necessary expenses in the investigation, and the collection and distribution of valuable economic forest-tree seeds and plants, $10,000.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to ask the Senator who reported the bill what nature of experiments for the production of rainfall it is contemplated shall be employed.

Mr. PLUMB. That will be in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. REAGAN. Perhaps the Secretary may be able to facilitate nature in some way, but I do not know exactly how he is to accomplish it. I do not care about making an appropriation in the dark.

Mr. PLUMB. There is a good deal of interest in the subject of the precipitation of moisture in various portions of the country, and the Senator will see that the amount is not an alarming sum.

Mr. VANCE. I rise for the same purpose which I suppose occasioned the rising of the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], to wit, to ask how this rainfall is to be artificially produced and to ask if there is any power in Congress under the Constitution to create artificial rainfalls. It seems to me that that is a matter which was not provided for by the desires of our fathers and I should like to know how it is to be done. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAIR. Under reserved powers.

Mr. PLATT. Under the general-welfare clause.

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator from North Carolina objects to the amendment on constitutional grounds, I hope he will proceed with his argument.

Mr. VANCE. I did not hear what the Senator said.

Mr. PLUMB. I say if the Senator objects to the amendment on constitutional grounds, I hope he will argue it on that basis, so that we shall have the benefit of his opinion upon that subject.

Mr. VANCE. When a proposition is advanced that is in the face of the experiences of mankind and of nature, the burden of proof rests upon the one who makes the proposition. I simply ask how the rainfall is going to be produced in a country where there is no rain produced by nature? If that can be done, it will be a great step towards the enriching of this world and the changing of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs upon the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the proviso to the clause making appropriations for "purchase and distribution of seeds—seed division," on page 13, line 2, after the word "plants," to insert "and;" so as to read:

Provided, That all seeds, plants, and cuttings herein allotted to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates to Congress for distribution remaining uncalled for at the end of the fiscal year shall be distributed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same clause, on page 13, after the word "as," at the end of line 18, to insert "near as;" so as to read:

Provided, however, That the Secretary shall not distribute to any Senator, Representative, or Delegate seeds entirely unfit for the climate and locality he represents, but shall distribute the same so that each member may have seeds of equal value, as near as may be, and the best adapted to the locality he represents.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the last proviso to the same clause, on page 13, line 20, after the word "seed," to strike out "packets" and insert "pockets;" so as to read:

Printing seed-packets, labels, postal-cards, circulars, etc., labor, paper, ink, type, and other necessary material for printing, and for purchasing and repairing printing-presses, $5,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, after the word "dollars," in line 7, to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That $4,000 of said sum shall be used only for repairs of buildings and water and gas pipes.

So as to read:

Furniture cases and repairs: Repairing buildings, heating apparatus, furniture, carpeting, matting, water and gas pipe, new furniture, and all necessary material and labor for the same, including lumber, hardware, glass, and paints, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 12, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "two;" so as to read:

Library: Purchase of necessary books, periodicals, and papers, and for expenses incurred in completing imperfect series, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the clause making appropriations for "salaries and expenses, Bureau of Animal Industry," on page 16, line 7, after the word "dollars," to insert "together with the unexpended balance of the appropriation for this purpose for the fiscal year 1890;" in line 19, after the word "reports," to strike out "and books;" and in line 20, after the word "relating," to strike out "thereto" and insert "to animal industry;" so as to read:

For carrying out the provisions of the act of May 23, 1884, establishing the Bureau of Animal Industry, $350,000, together with the unexpended balance of the appropriation for this purpose for the fiscal year 1890; and the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to use any part of this sum he may deem necessary or expedient, and in such manner as he may think best, to prevent the spread of pleuro-pneumonia and other diseases of animals, and for this purpose to employ as many persons as he may deem necessary, and to expend any part of this sum in the purchase and destruction of diseased or exposed animals, and the quarantine of the same whenever in his judgment it is essential to prevent the spread of pleuro-pneumonia, or other diseases of animals, from one State into another, and for printing and publishing such reports relating to animal industry as he may direct.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, line 22, before the word "thousand," to strike out "sixty" and insert "seventy-five;" so as to make the clause read:

Agricultural experiment stations: To carry into effect the provisions of an act approved March 2, 1887, entitled "An act to establish agricultural experiment stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of the acts supplementary thereto," $25,000, $15,000 of which sum shall be payable upon the order of the Secretary of Agriculture to enable him to carry out the provisions of section 3 of said act of March 2, 1887; and the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to employ such assistants, clerks, and other persons as he may deem necessary, and to incur such other expenses in traveling, stationery, and office fixtures as he may find essential in carrying out the objects of the above act, and the sums apportioned to the several States shall be paid quarterly, in advance.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, line 18, after the word "services," to insert "including $500 additional temporary compensation to the chief chemist;" and in line 21, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "fifty;" so as to make the clause read:

Experiments in the manufacture of sugar: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to continue experiments in the production of sugar from sugar-cane, sugar-beets, and sorghum, and especially for culture experiments, looking to the improvement of those sources of sugar, and for experiments in the more complete separation of the sugar from the molasses, and including all necessary expenses in these experiments, namely, traveling expenses, purchase of samples, apparatus, and supplies, chemical services, including $500 additional temporary compensation to the chief chemist, and other expenses incidental to the experiments, $50,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, to be made immediately available.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to offer an amendment to come in at the end of the paragraph.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire to interfere with action on the pending amendment?

Mr. REAGAN. No, sir.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, to strike out the clause from line 23, on page 18, to line 4, on page 19, inclusive, as follows:

Experiment Station, Department of Agriculture: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to prepare such portions of the Arlington estate as may be assigned to him by the Secretary of War as an experimental station and farm, and for expenses incurred in removing the present experimental station of the Bureau of Animal Industry to said estate, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. REAGAN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "available," in line 22, page 18, it is proposed to add the words:

Twenty-five thousand dollars of which shall be expended in the State of Texas.

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator will permit me a moment, I will move to strike out the words "to be immediately available," in line 22. They are not necessary, and striking them out will not interfere with his amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. Very well.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to strike out the words "to be immediately available," on line 22, page 18.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator's amendment will come in after the word "necessary."

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, after the word "necessary," in line 22.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "necessary," in line 22, page 18, it is proposed to insert:

Twenty-five thousand dollars of which shall be expended in the State of Texas.

So as to read:

Traveling expenses, purchase of samples, apparatus, and supplies, chemical services, including $500 additional temporary compensation to the chief chemist, and other expenses incidental to the experiments, $50,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, $25,000 of which shall be expended in the State of Texas.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN].

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, I ask for this amendment simply as a direction to the Secretary of Agriculture. Texas offers much the largest field of any in the country for the production of sorghum and a very large field for the production of cane sugar. During the last winter gentlemen representing the Agricultural and Mechanical College of Texas, and representing also the experimental station there, visited this city with a view to enlist the Secretary of Agriculture in aiding them to make some experiments as provided for under this paragraph of the bill for the more complete separation of sugar from molasses, etc. At that time of course nothing could specifically be done. Now, we have had appropriations, some $200,000 expended in Kansas on this subject, some $75,000 in Iowa, and perhaps as much in Louisiana—I do not know exactly the amount, but there has been a considerable sum expended in Louisiana. But there is none applied in the very extensive region of country covered by Texas, and there is great interest felt there in the subject. It may be made a source of great wealth to that country, and there is great interest felt in it there by the people engaged in experimenting in sugar production and the separation of sugar from molasses. If the amendment is not objected to by the committee, I should like very much to have the direction given to let a portion of this fund be expended in that State.

Mr. PLUMB. I sympathize very heartily with the view which the Senator expresses, not only as to the proper expenditure of a sum of money in Texas, but as to the result which he hopes will grow out of that expenditure; but it would be manifestly improper to direct that one-half of this money should be spent in Texas, or in fact, as I think, to give direction as to where any of it should be spent. The amount which has been expended heretofore has not been quite so large as was stated by the Senator from Texas, and it has not been divided at all in the way which he seems to think.

Mr. REAGAN. I spoke on this subject from my own information from the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator is incorrect, at all events, as to the amount of money expended in Iowa. I do not think any has been spent in that State, at all events only a small amount. But that is neither here nor there. The policy of the Department in making these expenditures has been to make them in connection with what private parties were doing. Wherever the Department has found private capital enlisted in this venture, it has endeavored to do, in the way of experimenting in connection with what the private parties had in hand, that which would enlarge the scope of the experiment and give to it a more satisfactory result.

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. PLUMB. Yes.

Mr. COKE. There have been propositions made, and they are still pending, by parties in Texas, who are conducting sugar-planting on a large scale, offering to put the labor and land and everything pretty much that is needed at the command of the Secretary of Agriculture for the purpose of carrying on these experiments. Those propositions have been made, and I have communicated them myself to the Secretary of Agriculture here. He did not have appropriations, he said, under which he could accept them.

If the appropriation is made, as requested by my colleague, for the expenditure of $25,000 of the money in Texas, there is no State in which money is expended for this purpose where the Government will be aided to a greater extent than in Texas by private capital already engaged in the business. They are anxious to put at the command of the Government very nearly everything that is needed in order to carry on the experiment.

Mr. PLUMB. I have no doubt that would be the case, but it will be much more liable to be the case if the statute does not require it to be expended there in such a way that these parties might naturally feel that they were independent. In addition to that, unless enough is given to do everything which may be required, it would be an unjust discrimination to say that one-half of this entire sum should be spent in Texas to the exclusion of other places where the need might be just as great.

I have no doubt that the Secretary will expend in Texas whatever may be proper in proportion to the demand elsewhere in connection with the entire amount appropriated. I would have been glad to have seen this sum made larger, in order that more of it might be expended there as well as elsewhere.

But the Senator will remember that there has been great interest taken not only in this question, but in the question of the production of sugar from sorghum and of sugar from beets also, which extends over a very wide section of country, embracing not only Texas, but Kansas and Nebraska and Iowa, and other localities situated in the same belt, with the same soil and the same climatic conditions; and California, I might as well say, also.

So, to take one half this appropriation and say it shall be expended in Texas would be to do possibly a great injustice, at any rate, to other localities and hamper the industry rather than to help it, and perhaps even embarrass the Department in its expenditure in Texas, because I can readily see how a person, perfectly willing, if the Department were in a condition to bargain with him, to do his full share, might say, "As long as the Department can not bargain with me at all and is bound to spend this money here I will assume an independent attitude."

Mr. REAGAN. I see the force of the suggestion made by the Senator—

Mr. MITCHELL. Allow me to ask a question. I want to know how much was appropriated last year.

Mr. PLUMB. About $40,000.

Mr. MITCHELL. Can the Senator tell me where that sum was expended?

Mr. PLUMB. I do not not know where all of it was expended, but part of it was expended in Delaware, a portion of it in Louisiana, a portion of it in Nebraska, and I think possibly a small portion in the State of Iowa, and some in the State of Kansas. I am not certain whether some of it was not expended in the State of California; my impression is that it was.

Mr. MITCHELL. What I wished to inquire was whether any of it was expended on the Pacific coast or not.

Mr. PLUMB. I think some of it was expended in Oregon or California.

Mr. MITCHELL. Has it been expended for the purpose of encouraging private enterprise?

Mr. PLUMB. It has been expended in making chemical and other experiments which were necessary to solve the question whether sugar could be made properly out of sorghum or beets. It took various shapes, although it did not take the shape of any purchase of machinery or anything of that kind.

Mr. REAGAN. I recognize the force of the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas, that this provision might require the Secretary to expend this money whether there was any private enterprise concerned in the experiments in the production of sugar from cane, beet-roots, and sorghum, and I am willing to amend and enlarge the amendment so as to cover the idea which the Senator has; that is, by adding the words "to assist such private enterprises as may be engaged in making such experiments."

I regret that I did not know this matter was coming up to-day, because I have some papers that would have given information which I can only refer to vaguely now by recollection. But there is a company making cane sugar in the lower part of my State, as I remember it, which has been making extensive preparations and employing a great deal of new and improved machinery and has succeeded in extracting a larger amount of saccharine from the given amount of cane than when it employed the centrifugal process of drying sugar.

Mr. GIBSON. That is Cunningham's.

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, sir; Cunningham's. Then besides, there is the experiment station at Bryan, Tex., which is also experimenting in this line, and it is proposed by the citizens there to establish a station, I think in Cooke County, in the northern part of the State, in very rich land, where ribbon cane can not be grown but where sorghum is grown with great success. I do not know what may be expected in the production of the sugar-beet in that country. Now, in some parts of California it is a great success. I do not know exactly what its success would be in our latitude and climate and soil, but the experiment might well be made. In the vast area of our country there, materially agricultural, where private enterprise is doing all it can to carry on these very experiments, it seemed to me desirable that some portion of the fund for these experiments should be expended in that State.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator if he is able to state that no part of the appropriation for the last fiscal year for this purpose was expended in the State of Texas.

Mr. REAGAN. No, sir; no part of it has ever been expended there.

Mr. PADDOCK. Very little if any of it was expended in my State, but I have been advised that the fund was very evenly distributed through the States, and that as many as twenty States probably participated in the fund.

Now, Mr. President, there has been no money used under that appropriation to speak of in my State; and I am able to say to the Senator that a plant for the manufacture of beet sugar is being put in in my State which is nearly ready for operation, which has involved an investment of five or six hundred thousand dollars, and that without any aid whatever, I understand, from the General Government. Therefore, if the Senator from Texas is to have $25,000 set aside by a special provision for his State, I should feel constrained, considering what my State has done without aid, to demand that it, too, should have the benefit of a proviso for quite a considerable sum. I should be very glad if the State of Texas could have $25,000 or as much as may be necessary, and I have no doubt if the bill passes and the appropriation is made according to the terms of the bill Texas now, in the light of the information he has given, would be sure to get its fair share.

Mr. REAGAN. Considering the amount of money that has been appropriated for this purpose and the large extent of Texas, an agricultural country producing extensively the very things to be experimented on, I do not think it is asking too much to ask that $25,000 be expended there, as it seems that unless we can get an act of Congress directing it we can not get any money expended there. I shall therefore leave to the Senate the question whether we are to have any expenditure in that State for that purpose.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Texas will not insist on his amendment. It seems to me to be rather a vicious way of dividing up this fund. We have on the Pacific coast great areas of soil, as we think, particularly adapted to the raising of sugar-beets. As the Senator knows, the making of beet sugar is a successful industry already in California; and Oregon and Washington undoubtedly have a large extent of territory that is adapted to beet-raising.

As long as the expenditure of the appropriation is left to the sound discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, I do not think the Pacific coast or the State I have the honor in part to represent will be disposed to find any particular fault, even if Texas should receive a very large amount of the appropriation; but if we commence this scramble for a division of such an appropriation, I should think myself not very much alive to the interests of my own State if I did not ask for a slice myself, to be expended in my State, and all the forty-two States of the Union would probably come in for a share, and Congress would determine where it is to be expended rather than the Secretary of Agriculture. I think therefore that the amendment is wrong in principle.

Mr. ALLISON. I was about to ask if the amendment of the Senator from Texas is amendable, or if the power of amendment is exhausted. I only wanted to say that if it can be amended I should like to give the other half to Iowa.

Mr. PADDOCK. I think there is another question more pertinent even than that.

Mr. ALLISON. It seems to me that it would be very proper to divide this between Texas and Iowa, especially as respects sorghum experiments. They represent about the two extremes of climate that can be expected to grow sorghum. I submit to the Senator from Texas that the other half should be given to Iowa. So I move that amendment if it is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CULLOM in the chair). The suggested amendment is in order.

Mr. MITCHELL. I suppose that will exhaust the right of amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON], who has been trying to get the floor for some time.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, I should be inclined to concur in the amendment of the Senator from Iowa if there were no other States except Texas and Iowa in the Union, and I were controlled by considerations that did not apply to the State of Louisiana at all. But a few years ago we secured an appropriation which was the beginning of these experiments in the manufacture of sugar, and the Department has already made several successful experiments in the State of Louisiana. We have nearly doubled the amount of sugar that may be obtained from a ton of cane by the experiments that have been made by the Government of the United States, by the application of the diffusion process, as it is called—the process applied in Germany and France to the manufacture of sugar from beets. We have also succeeded in making many improvements in the old method of milling.

That has been a great gain for the people of that State. The government of the State has also established several experiment stations which are being conducted under accomplished scientists and practical men. We believe further and more successful methods may be adapted to the manufacture of cane into sugar. We have also by improved methods of cultivation and fertilization increased largely the production of cane per acre. In old times we produced in that State only about a hogshead or a hogshead and a half, say a ton, of sugar to the acre; we now produce as much as two tons of sugar per acre.

Our sugar, too, grades higher in the market. It is graded on the average at about 16 by the Dutch standard. So the outlook for that industry in the State of Louisiana is very encouraging. We have not only increased the yield of cane per acre nearly double, but we have increased the production of sugar from a ton of cane itself about twofold.

We may hope at an early day without any extension of area and better methods of cultivation and manufacture to double the production of sugar in the State of Louisiana.

I trust, Mr. President, that this whole matter may be left to the discretion of the Department to determine how and where these experiments should be made.

Mr. GORMAN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. GIBSON. Certainly.

Mr. GORMAN. Do I understand the Senator to say that the results he has mentioned came from appropriations made by the Agricultural Department?

Mr. GIBSON. Not altogether, but mainly by the Government experiment with the diffusion process, which it was enabled to make by an appropriation made five or six years ago.

Mr. GORMAN. That is a very remarkable statement.

Mr. GIBSON. It was an appropriation similar to this. The amendment was offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] or myself, I forget which. At all events we concurred in that policy; and I take this occasion to congratulate him upon the successful results that have attended the experiment in the State of Louisiana.

Mr. GORMAN. I would inquire of the Senator if that was supplemented by the State action and private enterprise.

Mr. GIBSON. It has been since supplemented by State action and private enterprise. We have model farms established by the State of Louisiana, aided by private subscriptions, at the head of which is one of the most distinguished scientists, Professor Stubbs, in the country. He is aided by young men whom he instructs in the application of science to agriculture and the mechanic arts, and is achieving results that justify the confident hope that we may produce in the United States sugar from cane and beets in sufficient quantities to supply the people of the whole country, and thus save to them the enormous annual drain of a hundred millions in gold to countries whose tariffs exclude our own commodities. The sugar industry, expanded as it will be by the natural resources of our climate and soil, if not discriminated against by our tariff laws, will largely diversify our pursuits and afford an enlarged market for our farmers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN].

Mr. ALLISON. What has become of the modification of the amendment which I offered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not understand the Senator from Iowa to put the amendment in such a shape that it could be announced at the desk. If he has done so, his amendment will be stated.

Mr. ALLISON. Well, Mr. President, I withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa withdraws his amendment. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FAULKNER. On page 2, line 18, before the word "hundred," I move to strike out "four" and insert "eight;" so as to read:

One engineer, who shall be captain of the watch, $1,800.

I call the attention of the Senator from Kansas who has charge of the bill to the fact that this is in accordance with the estimate of the Secretary of Agriculture, but it was omitted by inadvertence by the Committee on Appropriations in the House of Representatives.

Mr. PLUMB. That is in accordance with the estimate. I do not know why it was left out in the House of Representatives.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COKE. I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has not indicated on his amendment where it is to come in the bill.

Mr. PLUMB. The amendment which the Senator from Texas has had printed does not give the necessary information. What he designs is to have an amendment added after the word "dollars" in line 25, on page 8. He wants the proviso to follow the word "dollars," and the amount also to be increased to $27,500, in place of $25,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 25, after the word "dollars," add the following proviso:

Provided, That $2,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be expended for an investigation into the natural history of and remedies for the cotton-boll worm, for compensation of additional temporary agents of the division of entomology, for traveling expenses, chemicals, insecticide apparatus, and other necessary expenses in this investigation.

Mr. COKE. The first part of the amendment was not read by the Secretary.

Mr. PLUMB. The two propositions do not necessarily go together. They ought to be voted on separately.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, the object of this amendment is to give the Agricultural Department the means of investigating the cotton-boll worm. Great benefit has been derived by the cotton planters of the South from the investigations of the Department as to the army worm, and the planters who raised cotton can now manage and control that worm and easily destroy it; but the boll worm is very much more destructive than the army worm. It utterly destroys any crop that it takes hold of; and it is very much desired that an investigation be made by the Agricultural Department into the nature of that insect in order that we may ascertain some means of destroying it. This amendment is to accomplish that object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] offers a further amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 25, before the word "dollars" strike out "twenty-five thousand" and insert "twenty-seven thousand five hundred;" so as to read:

Twenty-seven thousand five hundred dollars.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. After the word "dollars," in line 9, on page 9, I move to insert:

Provided, That $5,000 of the above amount may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, be expended in collecting further information relative to the wild native silk-worm in the State of California and in further developing the use and value of its silk product.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL]. [Putting the question.] The yeas seem to have it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Let us have another vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the question again.

Mr. MITCHELL. There can not be any objection, it seems to me, to this amendment.

Mr. GORMAN. I suggest to the Senator from Oregon whether it is not better to let this matter remain in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture. We have just now voted down an amendment making a specific appropriation of $25,000 for the State of Texas. It was voted down by an almost unanimous vote of the Senate, and I think quite properly.

Mr. MITCHELL. This proposition is a little different, as I can explain to the Senator from Maryland in a moment. That amendment related to an appropriation made for the development of the sugar interest generally. Here is a proposed appropriation of $25,000 for developing the mulberry silk-worm business. My amendment proposes to divert, if in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture he thinks it should be done, $5,000 of the amount to procuring further information in regard to the native silk-worm in California and developing its uses and value, etc.

Mr. VANCE. Does the Senator's amendment increase the appropriation?

Mr. MITCHELL. It does not increase it a dime.

Mr. GORMAN. Neither did the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] increase the appropriation. There was a general appropriation of $50,000 to promote sugar culture. We have now a general provision of $25,000 to be expended for the silk industry, all to be done under the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture. Now the proposition is that $5,000 of that $25,000 shall be diverted to California. It is a discrimination, it seems to me, that we ought not make. We voted down the proposition of the Senator from Texas—

Mr. MITCHELL. We can not hear what the Senator is saying.

Mr. ALLISON. I can not hear a word.

Mr. PLATT. I can not hear anything.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will please be in order.

Mr. GORMAN. The appropriation that is contained in the bill of $25,000 will enable the Secretary of Agriculture to take $5,000 of it and spend it in California, or anywhere else in this country that he sees proper. I think myself that it is very unwise to designate a particular locality or State for any of these expenditures.

Mr. MITCHELL. I differ entirely with the Senator from Maryland. I think it is a very wise thing to make a suggestion in this bill to the Secretary of Agriculture that it might perhaps be very proper to continue investigations that have been going on for the last four or five years in California in reference to the native silk-worm of that State, and in making experiments in reference to the use and value of the silk produced by that worm. It has been developed already that there is a worm in that State, and perhaps in Southern Oregon and in Nevada, that produces a cocoon that develops a fine quality of silk, not a superior quality, but the same kind of silk that was produced originally in the East Indies, and the same character of silk that is now exported from the East Indies in very large amounts and is now being used in at least two States in this Union, in Connecticut and New Jersey.

There are very large amounts of this product exported from the East Indies and being manufactured into various qualities of the silk product. It is very largely used in France. Millions of hales are used there annually, it is said, and it has been developed by experiments already tried under appropriations heretofore made by Congress that a very large product of this quality of silk can be produced on the Pacific coast, especially in the State of California.

Now, this is no direction to the Secretary of Agriculture. It is simply a suggestion. It is simply a provision that if, in his judgment, after looking over the whole ground, this is a proper thing to do, then he has authority to divert $5,000 of this money to making further investigation as to this native silk-worm. He would not be confined, as I think he is now under the provisions of the bill, and I have no doubt that is the construction he will place upon it, in any further investigation to experiments in regard to the mulberry silk-worm.

Mr. GORMAN. Why does the Senator say that?

Mr. MITCHELL. I have no doubt that will be the construction placed upon it, and that is the reason why I rather insist on this amendment. If it were a direction to the Secretary, without giving him any lee-way, perhaps it should not be incorporated in the bill; but as it is simply in the nature of a suggestion, leaving it to him and giving him authority, without any question, to use this appropriation for that purpose, it seems to me it ought to be permitted to go in. I do not understand that the Senator in charge of the bill has any particular objection to it, and I hope the Senator from Maryland will allow it to go in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL].

Mr. PLATT. Let the amendment be read, so that we may all understand it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be again read.

The SECRETARY. After the word "dollars," in line 9, on page 9, insert the following proviso:

Provided, That $5,000 of the above amount may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, be expended in collecting further information relative to the wild native silk-worm in the State of California, and in further developing the use and value of its silk product.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendments as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. GORMAN. Before the bill is reported to the Senate, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill to favor the Senate with a statement showing the amount of unexpended balances that are reappropriated in the bill—unexpended balances in the appropriations for the current year, which terminate to-day. I find on page 8 of the bill, for instance, and again on page 16, special provisions for the reappropriation of amounts. I should like to inquire as a matter of record why those unexpended balances are reappropriated.

Mr. PLUMB. The unexpended balances on page 16 amount to between $40,000 and $50,000, and those on page 6 are, as I am informed, between $4,000 and $5,000.

I agree, Mr. President, that is not a good way to appropriate money. It is, however, sometimes done. The excuse for it in these cases arises largely out of the fact that the Secretary has been reorganizing the Department, putting it into a more systematic shape for the work which he is required by statute to do, and in doing this he has had to intermit a portion of the time some of the expenditures which otherwise were going on, and in addition to that he has had to project some expenditures comparatively into an indefinite future, in such a way as to make it exceedingly desirable that the money appropriated last year may be continued in order that there may be no break in the operations of the different divisions.

I do not anticipate that this will lead to any repetition of this method of expending the public money, although the Senator is aware that this occurs occasionally in other appropriations as well as in the appropriations for the Department of Agriculture.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland has the floor.

Mr. GORMAN. I merely made the inquiry for information.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to state in this connection that the amount of the estimates for the Department of Agriculture for the coming fiscal year was $1,838,430. The amount appropriated in this bill by the House of Representatives was $1,753,600, to which the Senate has added, on the report of the Committee on Appropriations, $25,000, making a total of $1,778,600. There has been added in the Senate $2,500 by the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE], which makes the total that much larger.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the second committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9066) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, and for other purposes, further insisted on its disagreement to the amendments numbered 2, 21, 22, 23, 24, and 25, asked a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BUTTERWORTH, Mr. CANNON, and Mr. FORNEY managers at the further conference on the part of the House.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DAWES submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9066) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 3, 4, and 24. That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 3, 4, 7, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 26, 27, 28, 29, and 30; and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$64,638.90;" and the Senate agree to the same.

On amendments numbered 2, 21, 22, 23, 24, and 25 the committee of conference have been unable to agree.

H. L. DAWES,
F. R. PLUMB,
A. P. GORMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
BENJ. BUTTERWORTH,
J. G. CANNON,
WM. H. FORNEY,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the report.

Mr. DAWES. The condition of the bill is now perfectly plain to the Senate. All differences between the two branches have been adjusted and the adjustment agreed to by the conferees of the two branches, except the two matters which pertain to the clerks for Senate committees and the clerks for Senators. Those points are open, and those only. The Senate, it will be observed, made the clerks of Senate committees and the clerks for Senators annual clerks at a salary of $1,800 a year. To that the other House have not yet agreed. If there be no other motion I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendments and agree to the further conference asked by the House of Representatives. Any other motion may take precedence of this.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to make an inquiry. There was an appropriation for the Carson mint, the mint at Denver, and the mints at some other places, which was cut down by the other House below the estimate of the Department. The Director of the Mint called my attention to it in a letter, and I understand a letter was addressed to the Committee on Appropriations by the Secretary of the Treasury. I should like to inquire what has been done by the conference committee in regard to those items.

Mr. DAWES. That matter has passed beyond the control of both Houses some time since, and it is out of my mind just what has been done.

Mr. GORMAN. What was the particular item?

Mr. DAWES. The Carson mint.

Mr. STEWART. And the Denver mint. The amount appropriated was below the amount recommended in the estimate.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator will take my copy of the bill and turn to it he will find a record of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. DAWES. The report, I understood, had been concurred in, and the motion is now pending that the Senate insist further on the amendments yet undisposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report has not been concurred in by the Senate. The question is on concurring in the report.

Mr. STEWART. Before that vote is taken I should like to know the condition of the amendment with regard to Carson mint and several others that were put in by the Senate. The Senator from Iowa, when he had charge of the bill, made certain amendments to correspond with the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury as to additional appropriations for the Carson mint and for the Denver mint and for some of the assay offices.

Mr. DAWES. While the Senator is looking into that—

Mr. STEWART. I should like to know what has been the fate of those amendments.

Mr. DAWES. Those were passed upon several days ago in accepting the first report made by the first committee of conference. I am unable to state at this moment, but the Senator from Iowa will inform the Senator in a few moments. The question now pending is whether the Senate will accept this report. After the acceptance of the report the further disposition of the bill will be open in the Senate; but the acceptance of or disagreement to this report would not affect that question at all.

Mr. STEWART. All right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada insist upon occupying the floor?

Mr. STEWART. No; if the Senator from Iowa can make an explanation in a moment, I yield.

Mr. ALLISON. I can make a very good one at this moment, but I am afraid it will not be quite satisfactory to the Senator from Nevada.

I observe in looking over the amendments that the Senate recedes from the two amendments relating to the assay office in Nevada, and that the House recedes in relation to the mint at Denver.

Mr. STEWART. I do not understand why that should have been done.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senate also receded in respect to the amendment in relation to the mint at Philadelphia, where we increased the appropriation $20,000. But, as I understand, these amendments are not involved at all in this conference report.

Mr. DAWES. Not at all.

Mr. ALLISON. They have passed away.

Mr. DAWES. They were involved in the first conference report which was accepted, and it is settled now unless by unanimous consent we could go back and undo all that has been done thus far. I will state to the Senator that there was a good deal of struggle about the amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the report of the conference committee.

Mr. STEWART. I hope it will not be agreed to.

The report was concurred in.

Mr. DAWES. I will state further to the Senator from Nevada that the action of the conference committee in relation to the items named by him now comes to my mind. While the House conferees were very persistent in endeavoring to cut down the increases of appropriations caused by the amendments of the Senate, the committee of conference on the part of the Senate labored faithfully to maintain the position of the Senate on them all. They were obliged, however, to yield some in order to obtain others, and they used their best discretion as to where they could yield amendments increasing appropriations in order to save others. If they made a mistake in reference to the Carson City mint they regret it very much, but the matter has passed now so far that I do not see how it can be remedied.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would inform the Senator that there is no motion before the Senate.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the further conference asked by the House of Representatives thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President—

Mr. STEWART. May I make a remark now?

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly; I give way to the Senator.

Mr. STEWART. I can not understand, when we have the regular estimates of what is necessary to carry on a particular mint, and when the Secretary of the Treasury has addressed a letter to Congress stating that there is so much money necessary to carry it on, the mint being in full operation, why it should be denied the necessary money to properly carry it on. I do not understand that at all, and I do not think it is just. I do not think it is good legislation. These conference reports come in by numbers and nobody's attention is called to them. The attention of neither of the Senators from Nevada was called to the fact that the conferees were going to abolish that mint, but here it is done, for there is not enough money voted to carry it on.

It seems to me there ought to be some way of remedying this; and I ask unanimous consent that the item may be considered by the conferees in connection with this motion and insist that the conferees again consider that item with regard to the Carson City mint, for I do not think they intend in this way to stop the operations of the mint.

Mr. DAWES. I trust the Senator will do the conference committee the justice to believe that they have maintained the position of the Senate to the uttermost of their ability.

I will suggest a parliamentary difficulty in the way of the motion of the Senator, and that is that we can not confer upon a matter already settled unless the two Houses agree to go back and undo what they have done and embrace that in a new conference.

I regret very much that the Senator did not call the attention of the Senate to it when the conference report was first made to the Senate, and then if the reasons were so considerable as to justify a rejection of that conference report I have no doubt the Senate would have rejected it.

But the Senator must understand, and old experienced Senators here must understand, that the very object of a conference is to bring the two Houses together, and it is utterly impossible to bring them together by an agreement entirely on one side. Something must be yielded on one side as well as on the other; and between all the mints and assay offices of the land, the House insisting that they would not agree to all of the increased appropriations of the Senate, the Senate committee thought it wise to yield that one.

I repeat the regret of the committee that it has disappointed the Senator. There was no intention on the part of the committee to do any wrong to Carson City, but as compared with all the other mints, and as it met the insistence of the conferees on the other side, I do not see how it can be remedied now except in a deficiency bill.

Mr. STEWART. With the understanding that an effort shall be made to remedy this in the deficiency bill, and that the committee will aid in that, I shall not object further.

Mr. DAWES. I can not, of course, make any promise. I will state to the Senator that, so far as is consistent with my ideas of duty, I will do all I can to meet the Senator's views.

Mr. STEWART. I can not see why this mint should not receive the amount estimated by the Department as necessary for it to go on in the ordinary way. If there is any reason why, because it is located in Nevada, it should be discriminated against specially, I do not understand it.

Mr. DAWES. There was no such intention.

Mr. STEWART. Well, it has been discriminated against, and I do not know of any other reason for it unless because it is in Nevada.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. I should like to know the exact state of the question before the Senate at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] made a conference report upon a bill in which part of the amendments between the two Houses were agreed to, and some not agreed to. The conference report has been agreed to, and the Senator from Massachusetts now moves as to the amendments not disposed of that the Senate further insist upon those amendments.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to know what amendments are not disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will have to call on the Senator from Massachusetts to announce that.

Mr. GORMAN. I was about to state what the question is that is before the Senate.

Mr. President, there is nothing left by this conference report except two items, one of which is to provide for annual clerks to committees which are not so provided for now by law, paying them $1,800 per annum each for their services. The second proposition is to make clerks to Senators who are not chairmen of committees annual at $1,800 per annum.

Mr. GEORGE. On amendments made by the Senate, as I understand.

Mr. GORMAN. When the bill was reported to the Senate from the Committee on Appropriations, the Committee on Appropriations recommended that these clerks to Senators and to committees be allowed a compensation of $1,500 per annum. The Senate by a vote increased those amounts from $1,500, as recommended by the Committee on Appropriations, to $1,800. So when we went into conference on this bill the Senate conferees presented the proposition of these twenty-six committee clerks and twenty-six or twenty-five clerks to Senators at $1,800 per annum, together with an increase of the messenger force of the Senate and various other expenses attendant upon this body. The House of Representatives rejected every proposition for the increase of the pay of the Senate officers and for the increase of the number, and the increase that was found necessary for our contingent fund for conducting our machinery, etc., and the spectacle has been presented of the other co-ordinate branch of this Legislature declining for some time and finally yielding in this last conference to appropriations sufficient to pay the ordinary running expenses of this body, but they do reject and have declined up to this moment to permit us to employ the clerks of committees annually or the clerks to Senators annually, and upon that proposition we now stand, and that alone.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator state now what was the condition of the House bill with respect to these clerks of committees and clerks of Senators when it came over here, so that I may know, if we recede from our amendments, what will be the law upon that subject?

Mr. GORMAN. The clerks would then stand at a compensation of $6 a day during the session.

Mr. GEORGE. The House gave us that?

Mr. GORMAN. The House gave us that.

Mr. GEORGE. Then I should like to ask if that is not the compensation which the clerks of Senators and the clerks of committees have been receiving all the time up to now.

Mr. GORMAN. It is the exact compensation; but, Mr. President, the Senate in its wisdom thought it was wise to employ these gentlemen during the entire year, and the Senate fixed their compensation at $1,800 per annum, the Committee on Appropriations having recommended $1,500 in each case, as I remember, and I think I am correct in that.

Mr. President, when it comes to that proposition we find revived the old controversy which has been going on for a number of years, whether the Senate shall regulate its own affairs and whether it shall determine (of course within reasonable bounds) how many officers it shall employ and what compensation shall be paid them. As I understand, there is no objection elsewhere, and no objection, so far as I am able to ascertain, from the gentlemen who represent the House of Representatives, to the Senate having a sufficient number of employes, but they take the extraordinary ground that because there are three hundred and twenty-five members of the House of Representatives and only eighty-four members of the Senate, the members of the House, on the ground that they have more labor to perform, are as much entitled to personal clerks and committee clerks as members of the Senate, when the fact is that two Senators representing a State have all the work that necessarily concentrates upon the whole delegation in the other House, and there is no comparison between the amount of labor and the amount of committee work in the two Houses.

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] says it is greatly in excess in the Senate. Yes, and as it has been stated this is unquestionably a legislative body and all matters that come here are considered very thoroughly and completely, and there can not be any question on the part of any Senator that to facilitate the public business the provision allowing clerks is a wise and proper one.

But, Mr. President, it is useless for this matter to go back to a committee of conference unless the Senate determine by a vote that the adjustment be as made heretofore, which is that this provision shall stand, and shall so instruct the conferees by a vote of the Senate. If it is the determination on the part of the Senate that we are to surrender this right—for I regard it as such—that we shall permit another branch to determine how many persons we shall employ in this body and the exact compensation which shall be paid to them, I think the wise thing would be to surrender now and save another conference, and let the Senate recede from its amendment and let this great bill become a law, which is necessary to the affairs of the Government and which ought to be in effect to-morrow or to-day—

Mr. HALE. It ought to be signed to-day.

Mr. GORMAN. It ought to be signed to-day, as the Senator from Maine says. But for one I would stand and say to the other House, as in the past, as we have treated them on every occasion, "If you have determined that any number of officers is necessary for the conduct of your business we will give them to you, and we demand the same right on the part of the Senate." There never has been a controversy of this sort in which there has not been a surrender on the part of the body objecting to it. There never has been a case within my knowledge where the Senate has not granted to the House all it asked, and in this identical bill which is now before us, the House having omitted to provide for all the officers that they desired, they came to the Appropriations Committee, and the Senate gladly made the additions on the bill while it was in the Senate. It is true it was put on the bill while it was in the Senate. It is true it was but for a single clerk, but we made him an annual clerk at $2,000 per annum.

There is great inequality in the bill as it stands if these amendments of the Senate be not adhered to. The clerks—I will not take the time to read them all—of all the important committees of this body are paid fairly at $2,200 per annum, and there are assistant clerks and assistant messengers for certain committees. They were obtained by resolution of the Senate. There has been no equal distribution of them, and it was only possible to have an equal distribution by permitting Senators who are not chairmen of great committees and Senators who are not chairmen of any committees to have this allowance. Now, such a provision has been made. The same contest was made when the position was made at $6 a day for the session. I have before me, but I will not stop to read it, the debate which occurred upon that proposition. It was then said by the House of Representatives that we were exceeding our authority, that we were extravagant, and that we ought not to make a provision for clerks at all.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and the then Senator from Delaware, Mr. Bayard, and all who were in the body at that time and took part in the discussion, held that we had the right within reasonable bounds to determine the number of our employes and their compensation, and the Senate stood firm on this identical bill in 1884, and, as usual, the other House, the House objecting, receded and provision was made for them. The same condition of affairs exists to-day.

Now, if the Senate simply in the pro forma way which is proposed adopts this report and submits to another conference without any expression upon its part, it will be regarded unquestionably as a complete surrender on the part of the Senate, and we shall probably not have an agreement. I say so because of what I have seen and heard on this matter and know of it in conference. It seems to me that the Senate ought to say now what it desires and instruct its conferees accordingly.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland how we should express our determination on that or any other provision any more than we do by asking for a further conference. What method would the Senator suggest?

Mr. GORMAN. I would suggest that we should call the yeas and nays upon the proposition and let it be understood that the vote "yea" means that the Senate is firm in this matter. If we are to surrender by a vote of the Senate, as I said a moment ago, I would infinitely prefer to do it now rather than to go through the farce of another conference if we do not know when we go in that it is the will of this body that we shall adhere to these amendments.

Mr. TELLER. It is hardly possible that the Senate will propose to surrender the right to say what clerks it shall have. We practically concede that to every Department of the Government by making the appropriations conform to the estimates of the clerical force that they need; and certainly nobody knows better than the Senate does what the Senate needs to do the business which is intrusted to it. I do not think there is anybody here who wants to surrender that right, whatever he may think about this particular question; and, as is suggested by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], I have no doubt that if we surrender now we shall have in all time hereafter to yield to the House of Representatives upon this question and be at the mercy of the House.

It does seem to me that the rule the Senate has always maintained and has conceded to the other House as to the right of each body to select its own force and determine what amount of help it needs is the proper one, and that it ought to be maintained. I voted myself to give to each Senator a clerk at $1,800 a year, because I do not believe that good clerks can be had for less. I do not believe we have a right to call on men who are competent to discharge the duties of a clerk properly for less money than that. We give to the clerks in the various Departments who do not do as important work as our clerks do even more than that.

Whether I believed the amount was proper or not, I would not surrender the right of the Senate to determine this question for itself. That seems to be the paramount thing just now—not whether we shall give $1,500 or $1,800, but whether we shall reserve to ourselves the right to say what force we want and what payment is just and right. We can not afford to do less than to stand by this and to have it understood by the committee that, no matter whether the House agrees or whether it does not, we propose to stand by what we have done.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the real issue that is raised between the two Houses is not a question of the Senate deciding what its force shall be so much as it is what the pay of that force shall be. Under the present arrangement, which the House of Representatives consented to, reluctantly at first, but at last putting it into their own bills, that is, the bills which they prepare, every Senator has a clerk.

It took a long and hard fight to establish that proposition, but upon page 8 are found the provisions which in the House bill as it came to the Senate cover the general clerks of committees and the provision for clerks to Senators at $6 per day.

Mr. GORMAN. During the session.

Mr. HALE. If the Senate recedes and abandons the contention that has been going on during these conferences, every committee has a clerk at $6 a day for the session and every Senator has a clerk at $6 a day for the session. Now, the Senate has not been content with that, but goes on and increases the clerks who have been getting $6 a day for the session and the Senators' clerks to $1,800 a year, and the House lifts its hand in protest against that.

Mr. MITCHELL. Does the Senator think that is the proper thing to do?

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly the Senate had a right to put that on.

Mr. MITCHELL. And we did do it.

Mr. HALE. We did do it.

Mr. MITCHELL. And now the question is whether we shall recede from our former action deliberately taken.

Mr. HALE. The House protests against that, and the Senator from Colorado and other Senators say that it is the right of the Senate to increase the salaries of its employes to any extent. If the argument goes for anything, the Senate may increase the compensation to $1,800 this year, $2,000 next year, and $2,500 the next year, and the House can not say "nay" upon it.

I do not think courtesy between the two Houses goes to that extent, Mr. President. We are both legislative bodies. The House is performing duties of the same kind as the Senate. The House reluctantly consented to Senators' clerks at $6 a day for the session, and is making the contest now, and of course we are making still more apparent the difference between the House and the Senate.

It is not a question of increasing the force. The House does not propose to interfere with the Senators' clerks who are already established at $6 a day for the session, but when we go beyond that and increase the expenditure for the force here, not in numbers but in salaries, fifty or sixty or more thousand dollars, and the House has nothing corresponding, that body in the exercise of its right as a co-legislative branch of the Government protests, and I do not think, as I said, that the rule of courtesy between the two Houses forbids either House under such circumstances from entering its protest.

Suppose, as I said the other day, that the House of Representatives had chosen to double the pay of every employe, does any Senator hold that the Senate must blindly adopt that rule laid down by the House and vote for it because the House has determined to do that? And if next year it doubled it again, who will say that the Senate should have no voice in fixing the compensation?

The truth is, that there ought to be some relation between the force of the Senate and the force of the House of Representatives. The two bodies are the bodies which must consider the subject of the force of the two Houses. So, for one, as the House of Representatives have not in any way encroached upon the present privileges of the Senate and its force in extent, I am willing to vote to recede, and all the more freely because that is going to be the outcome.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Maine to be good enough to state what are the expenses, respectively, of the Senate and of the House of Representatives?

Mr. HALE. They are about the same.

Mr. GEORGE. About the same, and there are three hundred and thirty members over there, I believe, and there are only eighty-four here.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, of course my colleague can see that there was some injustice and some inconvenience in having these clerks paid simply for the session. It leaves the Senators without any clerks during vacation, when to a certain extent they need clerks then for the public business. Suppose—

Mr. TELLER. I should like to suggest to the Senator that it leaves a certain portion of the Senators with annual clerks, amongst whom may be included the Senator who has just been addressing the Senate.

Mr. FRYE. It would be supposed, perhaps, that it left me with an annual clerk, although I have never had one, and although my committee has had an annual clerk I have never had a clerk in vacation.

Mr. HALE. I never asked a clerk of my committee during vacation to attend to a stroke of work, and I do not want to do so.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will yield to me a moment—

Mr. FRYE. I had not got through with my question. Suppose, to obviate that injustice and inconvenience, the Senate had proposed a reasonable salary for such clerks as we employ, would there have been any difficulty in the House assenting to it, in my colleague's opinion?

Mr. HALE. That is a question which I think the House should consider, because it is a body like ours, doing like labors with ours, and the members of the House need clerks, I will not say, perhaps, as much as Senators, and yet you can not very well discriminate between the two. A member of the House has a great deal of hard work to do, as well as a member of the Senate, and I never saw much difference in the work, having had the honor of belonging to each House. I never could see much difference in the work. A busy man will be working all the time, whether in the House or in the Senate. If I were in the House to-day, I should feel the same sense of wrong that Senators, upon a general appropriation bill providing for all the branches of the Government, were allowed clerks in and out of vacation while members of the House had none. If the House was not ready to embark in the scheme of giving clerks to its members, I would not take away from them the right of a co-ordinate legislative branch to scrutinize our expenditures.

Mr. FRYE. Is there objection to the employment of these clerks annually, provided the salary shall be a reasonable salary?

Mr. HALE. I do not know, I will say to my colleague, what the objection is in detail on the part of the House.

Mr. GORMAN. I should like to answer the question and say that is precisely the objection. It is not the question of compensation. That was an open matter for adjustment. The conferees of the Senate not only were ready to offer to adjust that, but the House conferees objected to the employment annually of these clerks.

Mr. HALE. Annually. They do not object to the employment of clerks by the session.

Mr. GORMAN. They object to the employment of clerks annually.

Mr. HALE. They put in the bill session clerks, but they object to the annual salary of clerks.

I do not believe, Mr. President, that the Senate can maintain this contest very long. You may have a new conference, but it will be found that the House conferees are obdurate and the Senate is seeking to put a provision in against the will of the House, and the House conferees will simply lie back and say "no," and the bill be held up with all the vast concerns that pertain to it, and in the end the Senate will recede on this matter. Therefore I agree with what has been said, that if that is to be done it had better be done now, so that the bill can pass and we may not put the Departments to inconvenience by a continuing resolution, rather than to recede in a week or a fortnight from now. I think that will be the outcome.

Mr. TELLER. If we have the right to say what shall be the force, we must have the right to say what shall be its compensation. One is valueless without the other. That does not appear now to be the controversy.

Mr. HALE. The Senator speaks of the right. He means the right granted by courtesy between the two Houses, not a right by law.

Mr. TELLER. Of course not by law, but by courtesy—a courtesy that we have claimed and that has been conceded to the Senate for a great many years.

It must be presumed that in presenting to the House a bill either as to the number of clerks or the amount of compensation to be paid them it will be a reasonable bill. Nobody has the right to suggest, as the Senator does, that we are doubling or anything of that kind. There has been the grossest inequality with reference to this clerical force by the Senate for many years. There are twenty-five committees which have annual clerks, and not more than five of them require annual clerks any more than all the rest of the committees do. There has been a Committee on Census here that never met for a straight year, and that had an annual clerk, and the chairman, the head of that committee, is the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. Let me say right there, as the Senator is unable to continue this discussion without making what he evidently wants to be considered a personal allusion—

Mr. TELLER. Not at all.

Mr. HALE. I want to say one word about the clerk of the Committee on the Census.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly; I have no objection to that.

Mr. HALE. I found that clerk, when I became chairman of the committee, established and fixed at a rate which I knew nothing about before. I had no hand in establishing the rate, and it has continued ever since, but it is larger than the labors of the committee ought to require. I have always been in favor of a committee taking all these clerks and arranging them according to their duties and importance and arranging their pay, and that committee ought to go in with the rest, and we can all better afford to abandon this contest now because we have got a committee appointed to consider that matter.

I will say additionally that so far as its being any benefit to me when Congress adjourns, that clerk goes about his business wherever he pleases. I do not employ him or use him or benefit by him during the vacation between the sessions, and in the last three or four years and during the next two years he has done and will be doing more duties and more work than three-fourths of the committee clerks of the body.

Mr. TELLER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HALE. There are certain years that he does very little. There are other years in which he is doing very valuable service, working hard for the committee.

I should not have made this explanation, because I do not want to bring in personal matters, but it seems the Senator from Colorado could not debate the question without bringing in something of that kind.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I had not the slightest idea of disturbing the Senator from Maine. I alluded to his committee because that is one of several which absolutely have nothing to do. The clerk of that committee in eight years out of ten, or at least seven years out of ten, has nothing whatever to do.

Mr. HALE. Cut him down, then.

Mr. TELLER. I can mention other annual clerks, however, who have as little to do as he and even less than he. There is a species of favoritism here that is not agreeable, and the Senator who now has for the first time suggested that his clerk be cut down has never made the suggestion before.

I had no desire or intention of offending the Senator or saying anything personal at all. But he seems to stand as the champion of economy and for the surrender of this heretofore admitted courtesy at least on our part.

The Senator does not need this clerk, whatever the Senate may do. I suppose if he does not use this clerk he employs some man. Undoubtedly he does not get along without a clerk and he employs some man during the vacation to do his work and pays him out of his own pocket.

Mr. HALE. I do it myself.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator does his work himself he must have a great deal less to do than some of the rest of us have to do or he could not do it. I know Senators on this floor who can not do their work. For one I am willing to say that I can not do mine. I put in as many hours as any man in this Senate and I can not do it. I get requests from every State in this Union, and from every section where there is a soldier, where there are people interested in legislation. We all get these requests, and it is utterly impossible for any one man to do this work.

Since I have been in the Senate, when I have had a clerk I have hired other men to do extra work for me, as other Senators have done. There is no comparison between the members of this body and the members of the other House in general as to the amount of work which they have to do. I, for one, believe the Senate ought to insist upon having an annual clerk for every member of this body, or else we ought to return to the old system by which every clerk was dismissed at the end of the session.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to add to the explanation made by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] in reference to the clerk of the Committee on the Census, that that clerk was accorded to that committee when a distinguished Senator from Ohio was chairman of that committee and in very ill health, and it was on account of his position and his health that that was made an annual clerk, and has continued so ever since.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to suggest to the Senator that the position of every Senator in this body is the same, and the Appropriations Committee have no right to consider one Senator in preference to another.

Mr. DAWES. All that may be, but I believe the Senator will not think it out of order for me to allude to the health of some Senator under circumstances under which the Senate accorded to a Senator a clerk. The last Congress accorded to a distinguished Senator in this body a clerk during the vacation because of physical disability. The Senate is not above such considerations, however the Senator from Colorado may be.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, it seems to me that the Senate ought to take the common-sense business view of this question. The pretense of economy which is exercised in depriving ourselves of the necessary aid to carry on the public business is at the expense of the people. There are many things in which there might be economy, but there is certainly no economy in depriving Senators of the necessary assistance to discharge their public duty. The country understands that the compensation of Senators is too low; that it is a practical denial to poor men of the right to come to the Senate. Poor men with families can not come here and discharge the duties. The compensation to Senators and to members of the House is much less—it is not, in my judgment, half as much as those persons fitted for those positions can make in ordinary business; and the expense of coming here adds largely to the burden that they have to bear. Practically the Senators and the members of the House give their services without compensation. What they receive comes far short of paying the expenses.

Now, the attempt is to deprive them of ordinary assistance to do the business properly. The House of Representatives could very well afford to ask for clerks for themselves. They can make it up in other economy if they understand the business of the country and know where to economize and have more time to discharge their duties. It would be good economy for the House of Representatives to put in the appropriation bills clerks for themselves. There is no economy in us placing the representatives of the people in either House in such a position that they can not acquire all the information and discharge all the duties necessary to the legislation of the country. Great responsibilities rest upon members of the two Houses. Their whole time is devoted to the public business, and it is beyond the physical capacity of any Senator to discharge all the duties which devolve upon him; and it is ridiculous to say that we shall go bungling along without the necessary clerical force here while all the Government Departments have all that they require.

I think the Senate, in deference to its duty to the public, should adhere to its position in this matter. I hope the House will have the patriotism to provide themselves with the facilities for discharging the public duties, and let them be well performed. I think if we should back down now it would be an acknowledgment that we do not need what we have asked for, and we shall go on in the same manner, and many Senators will attempt to do the work themselves to the injury of their health. It would take twenty-four hours to answer the correspondence I receive daily, to say nothing of obtaining the information necessary for the practical discharge of my duties here.

Take any one of the committees that has investigations to make. Take a Senator who is upon the Committee on Claims with the work that is imposed upon him, if he has no assistance he can not perform it. Take the Committee on Military Affairs with its vast amount of labor, take all the committees, those gentlemen that are not chairmen of committees must investigate those questions or be ignorant of them. Is it not better to give them an opportunity to know the facts of the cases that come before them, so that they may legislate intelligently, by affording them the necessary assistance, or let the work go on haphazard without a general knowledge of what is requisite?

I think it would be wrong to yield this point at this time. I think the House, if they reflect upon it, will come to the same conclusion that we do—that it is economy to provide each Senator and each member with such assistance as to enable him to discharge the duties of his office.

I do not think the Senators or Members should be deprived of the necessary clerical force to enable them to do the public business, and it is masquerading before the public to pretend to economy in this way. We ought to have the manliness to say what is necessary for us to discharge our public duties as much as any of the Departments of the Government, and I hope we shall adhere to this in the most positive manner. Let us be understood now.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to say that I concur very fully and entirely with the very just remarks made by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] upon this question. I do not propose to elaborate; he has expressed the views so well. I may say this, though, in excuse for the action of the House, that the House has conceded to us, each one of us, a clerk at the price which we fixed ourselves, and at the same time the House denies to each one of its members that same provision. I do not think, therefore, Mr. President, that there is any occasion for complaint on the part of the members of this body of illiberality as against the House of Representatives.

I hope, therefore, that the Senate having fixed with deliberation some years ago, where the circumstances were very similar to what they are now, the sum of $6 a day for the clerks to Senators during the session, will recede from what I regard as its improper action of a few days ago in making the clerks annual and raising the salary to $1,800.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President, it strikes me after reading the debate upon the conference report in the House of Representatives that the real question at issue between the Senate and the House is as to the right of the Senate to insist upon making these clerks annual. In discussing the difference between the two Houses the member who had charge of the conference report distinctly announced to the House that on the question of salary, in his judgment, the amount as fixed by the Senate was too high, and that in the judgment of the conferees of the Senate it was too high, and further, that he believed it could be reduced by having another conference of the committees of the two Houses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is out of order to allude to what has been done in the other House to influence the judgment of the one in which a question is pending.

Mr. FAULKNER. I should think, Mr. President, that a Senator in speaking of a discussion in the other House has a right to quote here the RECORD as to the subject-matter of that discussion and the views expressed by members of that House bearing upon the question now before the Senate for consideration for the purpose of showing the difference between the two Houses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has always been held that it interferes with the independence which ought to exist between the two Houses to allude in one to what has occurred in the other as a means of influencing the judgment of those who are called upon to vote on any proposition.

Mr. FAULKNER. I am not trying to influence the Senate by what may have been said by any member of the other branch of Congress, but I am trying to ascertain and to let the Senate know what is the issue between the House and the Senate.

There are two questions presented in this conference report. The one question is that we desire to make these annual clerks instead of session clerks. The other is embodied in the same clause of the appropriation bill, which provides that the salary shall be fixed at $1,800 a year. Now, I want to see where the difficulty is between the two Houses, but, of course, if the Chair thinks I am out of order in referring to a public discussion, printed in the RECORD, which is frequently done on this floor, as showing the difference between the Senate and House, and not with a view of influencing in any way the vote by any Senator, I shall, in accordance with the rule which I have always adhered to, yield to the judgment of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it quite clear, and the Senator will not fail to observe the great difficulty which might result in the heat of discussion if reference could be made to debate occurring in the other House.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Chair undoubtedly states the rule of parliamentary law, but it is evaded so easily, and that has been done so often that I think the Senator ought to have found by this time how easily it can be done. The Senator has the right to say "it has been said elsewhere" or "such and such has been said," without referring to the place where it was said. I do not think there is any sense in the rule, although the Chair does right in calling attention to it. Still it is very easily evaded, and if the Senator will act upon the suggestion I give him he can state "it was said elsewhere so and so."

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President, it has been said in a body that is not deliberative [laughter] that the reason why secretaries are not provided in both branches of Congress is because there is a want of courage upon the part of certain gentlemen interested in these matters in one branch who decline to assume the responsibility to demand it, and not because of the fact that there is not a necessity in a deliberative body having similar duties and labors to the Senate that every member who is engaged in the public business and has imposed upon him the enormous amount of public service which is required in such deliberative body ought not to have some assistance in performing those public duties.

For myself, I can state without any hesitation that I would regard it almost as essential to have this clerk during the vacation as during the session of the Senate. During a Senator's absence from Washington in vacation a large amount of mail accumulates and numerous requests are addressed to him in reference to departmental business of vital interest to his constituents, and if he has some one here that he can rely on to keep him advised in reference to these matters he can promptly judge of the necessity of his personal presence to perform that public duty required of him by the wants and interests of those he represents. It furnishes him the means through which he is promptly informed of what is demanded of him, and the public business is transacted with more dispatch than by sending these letters and applications from Washington back to his home, from which he is frequently absent in the recess of Congress, causing delay in responding to the requests of his constituents. A confidential clerk avoids the inconvenience by promptly communicating any matter of importance, thus enabling him by letter or in person, whether absent or at home, to give attention to the business of those he represents. Mr. President, I am not fixed in my own judgment as to the proper amount of the compensation for these clerks. I am perfectly willing for the conferees of the Senate to decide that question as they may deem best; but in reference to the clerks being employed by the year, I do hope that the Senate will insist upon its amendment, and leave the question of compensation to be adjusted by the conferees.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, the amendments are so separated that the Senate can express its opinion first upon that one making the clerks annual and next as to their compensation, if it sees fit.

The committee hold themselves bound to maintain the position of the Senate, whatever that may be, and do not propose to yield until the Senate in some way or other indicates its will. The peculiarity of this situation is such that the Senate conferees are in a very delicate position. They desire to maintain the wish of the Senate without regard to their own views, and they do not feel quite at liberty, without some indication on the part of the Senate, to negotiate in reference to the compensation any more than in reference to the annual character of the clerkships. But still if there is any way that the Senate can indicate its desires the conferees will be glad to be instructed.

Mr. FAULKNER. I did not know that the amendments were so separated that they could be acted upon in that way. Personally I feel that the action of the Appropriations Committee was perhaps the correct action; but on the subject of the clerks being annual I must say that I have a very decided opinion, and I hope the Senate will show their determination to maintain that proposition. As for the duties of the clerk of a Senator being equal to those of a clerk of a committee I am satisfied that there is almost the same amount of labor imposed upon one as upon the other. I know, for example, taking the work performed by my own clerk as an illustration, that his entire time from 9 o'clock in the morning until 12 o'clock at night is entirely occupied in the public business which I have to perform and which he assists me in doing. I do not know of over five evenings during the present session of the Senate that the clerk I have employed has not been engaged up to 11 and often until 1 o'clock at night in the public business.

I have no private business to engage his attention; his time is given to the public service. I am satisfied that his compensation, even if fixed as high as $1,800, would not be extravagant or inequitable compensation when compared with other officeholders in the city of Washington who perform similar work, and for that reason I do not object to the compensation being made as high as $1,800, though I would have sustained the views of the committee fixing it at $1,500 had I not been paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator will observe that on the eighth page of the bill, the twenty-second amendment of the Senate was to strike out of the clause relating to the committee clerks the words "$6 per day during the session." Now, if the Senate adheres by a ye-and-nay vote to that amendment, that will settle the question of the annual character of those clerks. If the Senator will look at the twenty-fourth amendment it proposes to strike out of the clause relating to Senators' clerks the words "during the session."

Now, if the Senate in like manner, by a ye-and-nay vote, shall adhere to that amendment, then, upon the question of the annual character of these two classes of clerks, the expression of the opinion of the Senate, by a ye-and-nay vote, will be recorded. Then, you take the twenty-third amendment, which provides compensation for committee clerks, and the twenty-fifth, which provides compensation for Senators' clerks, and leave those open for negotiations in some way or indicate anything in any way you please, recede with an amendment will fix it, if the Senate desires to do that.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will ask the Senator from Massachusetts, as one of the conferees representing the Senate, if the Senate should insist upon these amendments and the House should agree to the annual employment of clerks, whether he would not feel justified in fixing the compensation of those clerks at such an amount as the conferees of the Senate would feel authorized to do?

Mr. DAWES. I could tell better if I could get an opinion of the Senate. For the purpose of getting at this, I will move that the Senate insist upon the twenty-second amendment.

Mr. GORMAN. That is right.

Mr. TELLER. What amendment is that?

Mr. DAWES. That is the amendment relating to committee clerks, striking out $6 per day during the session.

Mr. FAULKNER. That makes them annual?

Mr. DAWES. That makes them annual.

Mr. FAULKNER. An affirmative vote would declare in favor of making them annual?

Mr. DAWES. Yes. I ask that the question may be taken by a rising vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 22, strike out the words "six dollars per day during the session" and insert "$1,800 each."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts will observe that this proposed amendment is to strike out and insert. Therefore the question can not be taken as he proposes.

Mr. DAWES. That only shows how little I know about the rules. I withdraw my suggestion.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not want to debate this question, but only to say that it seems to me $1,800 is too much either for the committee clerks or for Senators' clerks. I want to add, too, that inasmuch as the compensation of our employes has to be made pursuant to laws enacted by the two Houses of Congress, I think we owe it to the House of Representatives to respect their views about what sort of laws they feel authorized to consent to.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, in the Land Office, I think, there are perhaps ten or eleven chiefs of division, as they are called, who get $1,800 a year. One of the clerks of those divisions gets $2,000 or $2,200 a year. Now, not one of those chiefs of bureau has duties or labors corresponding to the duties and labors of a Senator, and yet he is sustained by this vast array of clerks at $1,800 a year. I can not understand why it is that a Senator is not entitled to have a clerk at a compensation equal to one of the leading clerks or chiefs of division in the Land Office. So it is throughout the entire range of all the bureau service in this Government.

Now, it is a rather humiliating thing that Senators have to arise and ask their brother Senators and the other House for a sufficiency of clerical force and labor to enable them to perform the duties that are devolved upon them here by their position. I feel it, and I presume that every other Senator on this floor feels it. There are gentlemen on that side and on this side, too, who are able to make these expenditures out of their own pockets, in addition to the other large expenditures that every Senator is obliged to make here over and above his salary. They are able to make the expenditure out of their ample fortunes, and they have us at a disadvantage. They can go for low salaries, for reduced allowances, and the like, and perhaps make some little popularity at home among a certain class of people by doing it; but I would not undertake to deprive a brother Senator of the facilities of discharging his duties in this body and to his constituency on an account like that. We deserve to have the assistance of the Treasury of the United States to enable us to perform our public duties in this high station that we occupy.

At the close of a session of Congress all my colleagues in the other House go home, and whether it is the long recess or whether it is the short recess, they stay there unless they visit Washington occasionally on some business or other. It is expected of the Senators from my State that they shall remain practically in the city of Washington, and that they shall transact the business of the people of the entire State of Alabama, and they have a very great amount of it, with the Government of the United States, visiting the different Departments, and watching every pension case and every claim for public land, and every other controversy that comes here—every passport, and innumerable things that our attention is drawn to continually.

The burden upon the Senator's life would be intolerable, and that is all there is about it, if he has to stay here in the vacation without a clerk or else his people have to go unprovided with assistance of this kind, and transact the business that they flood in upon him. A Senator who has been here for some ten, twelve, or fifteen years, of course, is known, at least by name, to every person in his State who has any business to transact here. The result is that in the absence of members of the other House, and even while they are here, the Senators from the State are flooded with labors that it is absolutely impossible for them to perform without clerical assistance.

Now, not speaking immodestly about it, I take my own case. I am on five standing committees of the Senate, besides two select committees. If they were all to sit every week it would be seven days in the week, including Sunday, that I would have to be at work. As it is I have but one day in the week that I have any opportunity of devoting to my own personal affairs or to the transaction of outside business for my constituents. Without the assistance of a clerk I could not possibly get along, my constituency would go without this beautiful and vast endowment of garden seed that we have sent out through our distributor here, the almoner of the vegetation of the country; they would have to go without vast numbers of speeches that are made and sent to us, and that we sometimes make ourselves and desire to send out, and public documents of various kinds. If I had not had the assistance of a clerk my little committee-room would be so full of documents that I could not get into it to-day—documents that I never could have had the physical ability to have franked out of this Capitol.

I say this is rather a humiliating spectacle, that a Senator has to rise on this floor and beg the other House or beg his colleagues here that they will give him enough assistance to enable him to live and do the work that the duties of his office impose upon him. Nobody can come here in the absence of such assistance as this and afford to do the work for the compensation that we get; there is no gentleman who can do it, to say the least. There are few men I suppose in the United States, and men perhaps of a certain sort of ability, who would like to come in here and do that kind of work for the people, but take a man who is able to earn a living outside of this body, he does not want to do it. The result would be after a while that from the South as well as the North we should have this body filled up with a set of very wealthy gentlemen who are able to go out and furnish to the Government of the United States the money with which to get assistance to do the work of the people.

I do not work here for myself. I work here for the people whom I represent, and only for them. I do not work any more than numbers and numbers of Senators on this floor. We devote our lives to their service, and, Mr. President, it looks to me as if it were the very height, or the depth, rather, of parsimony to deny to ourselves, and have ourselves denied by the action of any other body, enough of assistance to get along with the public labor.

A Senator who can not leave his clerk in Washington City during the long vacation, and who must visit his constituency occasionally, and who is sent off on very important and very indispensable public duties, on committees, not junketing by any means, comes back here towards the month of December for the purpose of getting hold of his business again, and he finds stacks and stacks of correspondence that it is impossible for him ever to answer. The business of his constituents has been neglected, and all because the man has not the money to employ some clerk to stay here and take care of his affairs.

A clerk of a Senator is a man who ought to stand and does stand nearer to him than any human being in his business relations. He must be a confidential man. He must be a man who can open your private letters, who understands the current of your business, who will ascertain many, many things that ought not to be made public for the sake of the writers as well as the person to whom the letters are addressed. It is a confidential relation, and if you have to break that up at the end of every short session of Congress or the beginning of a long vacation, and detach yourself from your clerk and send him home, and perhaps skirmish around to get a new man at the beginning of the next session, is a very decided inconvenience. It is wrong to expect it.

Now, we have all these extra duties to perform that require us to make this attendance upon these committees that I have been speaking of. In addition to that we have treaties to consider, we have all denominations of business to consider that are sent here by this great Government, and, Mr. President, it is a matter of physical impossibility for a man, it makes no difference how strong he is, to transact the business of this great office that we hold here, doing the whole of it by his own manual labor.

So I am not affected by these arguments which speak about the duty of comity that we owe to the House of Representatives and our right to prescribe to ourselves what is a proper allowance of clerks and what ought to be their salaries. It may not be a legal right, but the Senator from Colorado put it upon the right ground. When we want to ascertain from a departmental officer in the United States what service is necessary in his Department or bureau, we provide by law that he shall make a statement of the service necessary and make an estimate of the salary that ought to accompany it. We have to make our own statements and our own estimates. We do it here by our votes upon appropriation bills and otherwise, and I think we are as much entitled to be heard by the other House upon matters of this kind as if we were a bureau officer or a Department chief and had sent in a regular estimate under the laws of the country for the support and assistance that we need.

Therefore, I am in favor, sir, of adhering to the action of the Senate, taken very deliberately and for good reasons, upon this appropriation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYN in the chair). The question is on the motion made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES].

Mr. DAWES. The general motion was made that the Senate further insist and accede to the request of the other House for a further conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate further insist upon its amendments undisposed of, and agree to the further conference asked by the House of Representatives.

Mr. DAWES. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. DAWES. I will first call for a division.

Mr. STEWART. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. DAWES. Very well.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to have the precise question stated upon which we are to vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts presenting the report moves that the Senate further insist upon its amendments undisposed of and agree to the further conference asked by the House of Representatives thereon. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLPH (when Mr. BROWN's name was called). I am usually paired with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN], but I have information that he desires to be paired in favor of this motion, and I have therefore made a transfer of the pair to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. PIERCE]; and I am at liberty to vote.

Mr. DAVIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], and I vote "yea."

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY], but I understand that he would vote "yea," and I will therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. MORRILL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. PETTIGREW (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], but I am informed that he would vote "yea" on this proposition, and I therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. DOLPH (when the name of Mr. PIERCE was called). I have already announced the pair of the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. PIERCE]. I am desired by the Senator from North Dakota to state that if present, he would vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. COKE. I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], who is absent. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. HAMPTON. I am paired with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]. Can his colleague [Mr. DIXON] tell me how he would vote?

Mr. DIXON. I think my colleague if present would vote "yea."

Mr. HAMPTON. Under that authority I vote "yea."

Mr. PADDOCK. I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS].

Mr. ALLISON (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], but understanding that on this question he would vote "yea," I allow my vote to stand.

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 8; as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House insisted upon its amendments to the bill (S. 3163) to reorganize and establish the customs collection district of Puget Sound, disagreed to by the Senate, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. LIND, Mr. SWENEY, and Mr. CAMPBELL managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 138) to increase the number of members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and to fill vacancies in such board, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CUTCHEN, Mr. WILLIAMS of Ohio, and Mr. LANHAM managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 8909) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 9856) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891.

ADMISSION OF IDAHO.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate resumes consideration of the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4562) to provide for the admission of the State of Idaho into the Union.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, the consideration of all the facts connected with the admission of new States into the Union is important, and should be so regarded by Congress. The presentation of the credentials and the admission of a new Senator to a seat in this body is a privileged question of the highest order. So the admission of a new State is a question of the highest consideration. The statesmen who framed the Constitution, after determining upon the organization of the Government into three great separate and co-ordinate departments, proceeded to the consideration of other questions or features of the Constitution, the necessity of which had been made apparent by the history of the Confederacy, and among other important subjects considered was the admission of new States into the Union. The necessity of extending the boundaries of the United States and increasing the number of States was regarded as important as the population began to press to the westward.

As has been said, I believe during the discussion of the bill for the admission of Wyoming, the ordinance of 1787 made provision for the establishment of new States in the Northwest Territory, and declared that when any of them should have 60,000 free inhabitants it should be admitted into the Union, or into Congress as the expression is, on an equal footing with the original States.

All along in the history of the Republic new States have been knocking at the door of the Union for admission, and, after due consideration, have been admitted on an equal footing with all the rest. They have been admitted in pursuance of enabling acts by Congress and without any previous action by Congress preparatory to their admission. It may be said to be entirely in order to admit a State when in the judgment of Congress it is fit to become a member of the national family, and to reject it if in the judgment of Congress for any reason it is not. The fact that it has or has not come to Congress in pursuance of an enabling act, in my judgment, is of no sort of consequence.

The simple provision of the Constitution is that "new States may be admitted by Congress into this Union." (See section 3, Article IV.) The language of the Constitution conveys the idea of discretion on the part of Congress, but the fathers evidently meant that that discretion should be exercised with due regard to the interests of the people of the Territory asking admission as a State, as well as of the Union of which the State was seeking to become a part.

Congress is bound in the performance of its duty under the Constitution to inquire into all the facts pertaining to the Territory, its resources, its population, and its institutions, in addition to the inquiry into the question whether the constitution presented is republican in form. Were this not so there could be no reason for delay on the part of Congress in deferring the admission of Utah, for its population and resources have been abundant for years.

It was argued with much earnestness on the part of those opposed to the admission of Wyoming, and I suppose the same arguments will be urged against the admission of Idaho, that there have been no enabling acts authorizing these Territories to call and hold conventions and make constitutions, so that they might hereafter come to Congress and ask to be admitted. The three distinguished Senators from Arkansas, Alabama, and Delaware all urged that the manner of the coming of these Territories for admission as States is irregular, and the Senator from Delaware asks, why this bustle and haste? or words to that effect. Well, Mr. President, if the rule had been that no Territory could be ever had been admitted as a State without coming in under a previous enabling act there might be force in the argument and position, but any supposed rule on that question has been disregarded, as many of the States of the Union have been admitted without previous enabling acts.

The record shows that the States of Tennessee, Oregon, Iowa, Michigan, California, Vermont, Kentucky, Maine, Arkansas, and Florida were admitted into the Union without previous enabling acts; so of Nebraska, as it failed to follow the act of Congress; and that great empire, Texas, was admitted into the Union as a State, I believe, by joint resolution. They were admitted in accord with the judgment of Congress after investigation of the facts belonging to each application as a Territory seeking admission as a State. In the case of Wyoming, which the Senate voted to admit on Friday last, the Legislative Assembly memorialized Congress for an enabling act in 1883. Bills were introduced in Congress to enable the people of Wyoming to form a State constitution, and though one was unanimously reported in this body, for want of time it failed to pass.

Subsequently the several boards of supervisors of the counties memorialized the governor, chief-justice, and secretary of the Territory to apportion the Territory into delegate districts, and to the governor to call an election for a constitutional convention, following the bill reported by the committee to the Senate, though not passed or acted on. Subsequently, and since the adoption of the constitution, the Legislature of the Territory memorialized Congress for the admission of the Territory as a State in the Union.

The Senator from Alabama was apparently much concerned about the want of evidence of what had been done in the Territory in calling and holding conventions, the returns, etc. Mr. President, I think the evidence was abundant to show all the facts necessary to justify the action of Congress in admitting the State. While additional facts might have been furnished with propriety, yet abundant evidence of the substantial facts was supplied.

As to Idaho, the bill for the admission of which is now under consideration, it comes here without having had an enabling act and asks admission as a State. During the last Congress a bill was reported to the Senate from the Committee on Territories authorizing the people of Idaho to hold a convention and frame a constitution to be submitted to the people with a view to the admission of the Territory as a State in the Union. Like that of the Wyoming bill, it was not acted on by the Senate for want of time.

After the adjournment of Congress the then governor, Stevenson, issued a proclamation calling upon the people of the Territory to elect delegates to a convention to be held at Boise City, the capital of the Territory, on the 4th of July, 1889, to frame a constitution for the State. Governor Stevenson was succeeded in office by Governor Shoup on the 1st of May, 1889, and on the 11th of May he supplemented his predecessor's proclamation by indorsing his recommendations. The previous governor, Governor Stevenson, if I may be allowed to say so, was a Democrat, appointed by the late President Cleveland, and the present governor, Governor Shoup, was appointed by the present President of the United States.

In pursuance of these proclamations an election was held and seventy-two delegates were chosen, and during the convention all but three, as stated, appeared and took part in the deliberations of the convention.

The convention which was convened by the governors of Idaho (one a Democrat, the other a Republican) to frame a constitution was non-partisan in its work, and the constitution agreed on by the body of men composing the convention was framed in July and voted on in November following, giving ample time to the people to consider it. There was comparatively little disagreement as to the wisdom of its adoption. More than 14,000 votes were cast at the election, and of that number only 1,733 were cast against the constitution, and, as I am informed, these votes were given by voters scattered over the Territory in the different counties and represented the various objections to particular clauses of the constitution.

No constitution was ever made in a Territory, State, or nation which proved satisfactory to all the people to be influenced by it. Men who know tell me that no objections to the constitution were urged, so far as known, by voters in the Territory on account of the apportionment clause, as it was not an issue.

Governor Stevenson made the apportionment of delegates to the convention, which was accepted without criticism or objection by either political party. The result of the election gave the Republicans a majority in the convention. The officers of the convention were divided between the two parties, as were the chairmanships of committees.

So I may say, Mr. President, that all the facts go to show that there was substantially no political controversy existing in the Territory with reference to its admission as a State or in anything that was done in order to bring about that result. There was no politics in the movement from the beginning to the end, and any attempt to drag politics into the question of admitting Idaho as a State in the Union comes from Democrats here, and not from the Territory.

In the discussion of the question by the Senator from Missouri there is this fact which he overlooked or was not aware of: The Mormons are disfranchised in Idaho, and hence they were not counted in the apportionment for members of the Legislature.

I am referring in these remarks especially to what was said by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], as when he addressed the Senate he announced, I believe, that whatever he had to say on the question of the admission of these Territories would be said all at the same time.

Bear Lake County, referred to as a Democratic stronghold, has not, I am informed, 100 legal voters in it. At the election in 1888 there were but 82 votes in the county. That county is the hot-bed of Mormonism. There are more polygamists in that county than there are legal voters.

The counties of Lemhi and Custer referred to are settled by as intelligent and patriotic citizens as can be found anywhere. And the county of Shoshone, which the Senator from Missouri compared with Bear Lake, contains what is known as the Oœur d'Alène mines, and is one of the richest mining regions in the world. The members of the Idaho convention, Democrats and Republicans alike, agreed that Bear Lake County, with its 82 legal voters, was not entitled to as great representation as the 1,800 in Shoshone, or the 707 in Custer, or the 763 in Lemhi County.

The Mormons are confined to the counties of Bingham, Oneida, Cassia, and Bear Lake, and because they were not voters they were not counted in making the apportionment for the Legislature.

The people of Idaho of both parties are determined that so long as they have the right to control the question the Mormon population shall have no voice in the control of the Territory, or, if admitted, of the State. If Congress should decline to admit Idaho now under their present constitution with the provision in it prohibiting bigamists and polygamists, or those living in what is known as patriarchal, plural, or celestial marriage, or in violation of any law of the Territory, State, or United States forbidding any such crime, it will not change the position of the people of Idaho. The action of those people on that question as embodied in their statute and in the constitution has been sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the law-abiding people of the Territory expect to stand by it.

No Democrat from Idaho has objected to the apportionment. Objections either to the constitution, to the apportionment, or to statehood by Senators on this floor reflect the wishes and opinions of the Mormons of Idaho mainly, and not those of either Democrats or Republicans. No protest, so far as I can learn, against the constitution or the admission of the Territory has come here from the people of the Territory. The people expect to be admitted, and almost universally desire to be admitted.

To go back, Mr. President, to the question of the regularity or irregularity of the admission of the State: When California was asking for admission, Mr. Berrien, a Senator from Georgia, and a member of the Judiciary Committee, made a report in which he used the following language:

The power conferred by the Constitution on Congress is to admit new States, not to create them. According to the theory of our Government the creation of a State is an act of popular sovereignty, not of ordinary legislation. It is by the will of the people of whom the State is composed, assembled in convention, that it is created.

California had no enabling act. It came to Congress with a constitution, a State government created by the people, and asked admission, and was admitted. William L. Dayton, then a Senator, said:

California is a State, a State de facto. It exercises the powers of an organized government. Whether it is or shall be a State de jure depends on the action of this Government.

Hannibal Hamlin, then a Senator, and still living, an honored and aged statesman and patriot, said:

The Constitution is silent as to any power to create a State. The convention that framed the Constitution did not consider any proposition of that sort. It clearly never entered the minds of that body to insert any provision for creating new States.

I give, Mr. President, quotations from Madison, Hardin of Kentucky, Benton, Buchanan, John C. Calhoun, Clay, Sumner, and could give many more, showing that no objection should be urged against the admission of Idaho because it does not come here in pursuance of an enabling act; that that is a matter of no substantial consequence. The important thing for Congress to determine is whether, when a community, or a State, if you please, comes to Congress and asks for admission, it comes with those conditions surrounding it that justify Congress in admitting it as a State in the Union.

In discussing the question of the admission of Tennessee, Mr. Madison said:

The inhabitants of that district of country were at present in a degraded situation; they were deprived of a right essential to freemen, the right of being represented in Congress. Laws were made without their consent or by their consent in part only. An exterior power had authority over their laws; an exterior power appointed their executive, which was not analogous to the other parts of the United States and not justified by anything but an obvious and imperious necessity.

He did not mean by this to censure the regulations of this provisional government, but he thought where there was doubt Congress ought to lean towards a decision which should give equal rights to every part of the American people.

In the debate in relation to the admission of Missouri, Mr. Hardin, of Kentucky, used the following language:

The Constitution, when it says "new States may be admitted by Congress into the Union," is silent upon the subject of numbers or boundary, but leaves that subject to the sound discretion of Congress. The manner in which that discretion has been exercised has been so uniform and invariable that it amounts to a law. It is, Mr. Chairman, a proclamation to the inhabitants of all the Territories that whenever their numbers approach the fifty or sixty thousand they shall be at liberty to burst from around them the bonds and chains of Territorial servitude and vassalage and assume and exercise the rights of self-government as the inalienable rights of mankind.

Mr. Barbour, a Representative from the State of Virginia and subsequently one of the judges of the Supreme Court, said:

On my part it is contended that the power of Congress is limited to the simple alternative of admitting or not admitting, and even this power is subject to modification; that they have not a moral right to refuse admission to a Territory whose situation and circumstances suit it for admission.

Mr. Benton, in commenting upon the case of Michigan, said:

Conventions were ordinary acts of the people. They depended upon the inherent and inalienable rights. The people in any State may at any time meet in convention without a law of their Legislature and without any provision of Congress, any provision in their constitution, and may alter or abolish the whole frame of government as they please. The sovereign power to govern themselves was in the majority, and they could not be divested of it.

In a speech delivered in the Senate in February, 1849, Mr. Calhoun said:

I hold it to be a fundamental principle of our political system that the people have a right to establish what government they may think proper for themselves; that every State about to become a member of this Union has a right to form its own government as it pleases, and that in order to be admitted there is but one qualification, and that is that the government shall be republican. There is no express provision to that effect, but it results from that important section which guarantees to every State in this Union a republican form of government.

The following extract is taken from a report by Mr. Clay in relation to the admission of California:

There are various instances prior to the case of California of the admission of new States into the Union without any previous authorization by Congress. The sole condition required by the Constitution of the United States in respect to the admission of a new State is that its constitution shall be republican in form.

Mr. Buchanan, on the question of the admission of Michigan, I believe, used the following language:

The precedent in the case of Tennessee has completely silenced all opposition in regard to the necessity of the previous acts of Congress to enable the people of Michigan to form a State constitution. It now seems to be conceded that our subsequent approbation is equivalent to our protest. This can no longer be doubted. They have the unquestionable power of waiving any irregularities in the mode of forming the constitution, had any such existed.

In relation to the admission of California Mr. Benton used the following in answer to objections urged to the admission of that State because it did not come under an enabling act authorizing the people to frame a constitution:

The fact is admitted, but its consequence is denied. Congress has full power over the admission of new States, and may dispense with all preliminary forms when it pleases and come direct to the question of admission. It has admitted more new States without than with the previous authority of an act of Congress to form a constitution. Eight have been so admitted: Vermont, in 1791; Kentucky, 1792; Tennessee, 1796; Maine, 1820; Arkansas, 1836; Michigan, 1837; Florida, 1845; and Iowa, 1846—eight in all, a majority of the whole number ever admitted and stretching over a period of sixty years and reaching back to the venerable times of our early history when Washington was President and the fathers of our political church were still at the altar.

So far as I am concerned I believe it has come to be a recognized right of Congress to investigate and look into all the facts pertaining to the condition of the Territory, and if in the judgment of Congress the facts do not justify the admission of a Territory it is clearly in my opinion the right of Congress to keep it out.

Now, Mr. President, I do not think I need to say more on the question of regularity or in answer to the charge that the Republican party of either Territory has undertaken to secure an advantage over the Democratic party in calling the conventions or in districting the new States under their respective constitutions.

The Senator from Alabama has manifested much opposition to the admission of Wyoming because the boards of supervisors of the several counties of that State petitioned the governor, the chief-justice, and the secretary of the Territory to apportion the Territory into districts in the same manner as provided in the bill reported from the Committee on Territories for an enabling act for the Territory. Those three distinguished officers did exactly the thing that the enabling act provides which the Senator advocated as a substitute for the admission bill and the same provision will be found in the bills for enabling acts introduced by a half-dozen Democrats in this Congress.

I call the attention of the honorable Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to the fact that the enabling act introduced by the honorable Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] as a substitute for the bill admitting Wyoming, which, as I suppose, would be expected to apply to Idaho as well, provided for exactly the same thing: that the governor, the chief-justice, and the secretary should do what was done in the case of Wyoming. The fact is that there are a half-dozen enabling acts introduced by different members of the Senate and of the other House of both parties, all of them containing exactly the same provision.

Mr. President, I think I have shown that there is nothing extraordinary or very unusual in the manner of the coming by these States to Congress to ask for admission into the Union. I think it can not truthfully be charged that there has been any design or effort by either great party in either of the Territories to secure a political advantage in the preparation made for admission; and I am sure there has been no scheming for political advantage by the Committee on Territories in bringing these bills into the Senate. They are here because the committee regarded it as a duty to bring them here and secure the admission of these States as a duty to the people within their borders and as a duty under the Constitution of the United States.

The Senators from Arkansas and Alabama seem to insist that there must be something wrong, some partisan purpose or design, on the part of the Republican members of the Committee on Territories, or we would favor the admission of New Mexico and Arizona along with Wyoming and Idaho. Well, Mr. President, we are entirely innocent, I assure you and the distinguished Senators. The fact is we have scarcely been asked to admit either of those Territories.

Mr. PAYNE. I beg pardon. Will the Senator allow me to ask him if there was not a bill before the Committee on Territories for the admission of New Mexico?

Mr. CULLOM. I will show just what was done. A memorial was presented by the chairman of a committee to memorialize Congress for the passage of an enabling act permitting the people of New Mexico to vote for and against the adoption of the constitution which had been adopted by the convention of the Territory. A delegation, I believe, of one hundred was appointed to come here for that purpose, but only one man appeared.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. That has been surrendered and abandoned by all parties in New Mexico. All that the united delegation of all parties asked for was a new enabling act.

Mr. CULLOM. So far as an enabling act is concerned, I admit that that is here, but the proposition now is to insert in a bill before this Congress a proposition to admit both those Territories, and I insist, and I think the honorable Senator from Ohio will agree with me, that neither of those Territories has come here in such a manner as to justify us at the present time in placing them alongside of Wyoming and Idaho.

Mr. PAYNE. I prefer that the Senator should not complicate the case of New Mexico with Arizona. I have nothing to say about Arizona at present, but I repeat, as to New Mexico, a delegation composed of the most respectable men of both parties, officers and ex-officers, and the leading men of that Territory, have been before these committees, and they have a bill pending providing for an enabling act.

Mr. CULLOM. In the first place, the delegation that the Senator refers to came here for another purpose. They came here to get a bill through allowing them some share of the public lands for the benefit of the schools of that Territory.

Mr. PAYNE. If the Senator will allow me to correct him, they asked for the school bill, the bill which I introduced, giving them land for school purposes, because they saw no possible way to get through their first bill for an enabling act.

Mr. CULLOM. Their first intention, as I understand it, was to get legislation on the land question, and then they turned their attention, without authority, from the Territory to the question of an enabling act to get the Territory into the Union.

Mr. PAYNE. It was just the other way. It was the enabling act first and then the land question afterwards.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I am not prepared to say that, if New Mexico will show a reasonably united disposition to come into the Union as a State, I will not favor her admission. A couple of years ago, with the light that I then had on the subject, I did not believe that the time had come when New Mexico should be admitted. But the people of that Territory have made more rapid progress of late than heretofore; they are rapidly qualifying themselves in the study of the English language, their courts are improving, the Territory possesses great resources, and in my judgment it will be but a very short time, possibly at the next session of Congress, if they come here in a united manner, that we would feel it our duty to vote for the admission of that Territory as a State into the Union.

I do not believe that the honorable Senators who oppose the admission of Wyoming and Idaho seriously desire that the two Territories of New Mexico and Arizona shall be admitted as States now, with the limited information before us as to the condition of the two Territories and the wishes of their people. I certainly can not support a bill for the admission of either without further information in regard to them.

I come now to the question of fact, whether Idaho is worthy of a place by the side of the other forty-two States of this Union; forty-three, counting Wyoming. I regard her constitution as republican in form. I assume no question will be raised on the constitution unless our friends, who seem to feel that we are seeking a political advantage, shall raise a question over section 3, article 6, in regard to suffrage and elections. As that provision, or one in terms substantially like it, has been passed upon by the Supreme Court I assume that no serious opposition will be founded on that section.

Passing by the fundamental law I come to the question, Has the Territory sufficient population and resources and are all the conditions satisfactory to justify statehood? In 1880 the population was 32,619. Of the total population at that time there were 6,698 children of school age. Taking those two facts a table is made which I find embodied in a report by Mr. DORSEY, of the House of Representatives, from the Committee on Territories, estimating the number of children and total population from 1880 to and including 1889, which shows a total population of 117,225. It is, I think, reasonably certain that there are 100,000 or more people, exclusive of Indians, in Idaho Territory. The Territory was created March 3, 1863.

The average annual gain I find stated by Hon. FRED. T. DUBOIS, the able Delegate from the Territory, in population from 1881 to 1889, inclusive, was 10,500, which would make the population 127,000. But for the last two years it has grown more rapidly than before, and the per cent. of increase, therefore, is greater. Whether these calculations are based on reliable information I can not say; but, Mr. President, there can be no doubt that the population of that Territory exceeds the population of any one of one-half of the twenty-nine States admitted into the Union since the adoption of the Constitution of the United States. I will give here a list of the States admitted, the date of their admission, and their population at the time of admission.

‡Estimated November 1, 1889.

§Estimated September 30, 1889.

Leaving the question of the population, what can be said of the area and resources of Idaho Territory? It was organized with an area of 325,000 square miles. In 1863, by the creation of Montana and Wyoming, its area was reduced to 86,294 square miles. It contains 55,228,160 acres, 16,000,000 acres of which are said to be agricultural, 10,000,000 acres of forests, 31,000,000 acres mineral and grazing lands, and 1,228,000 acres of water. The great Snake River, said to be equal to the Ohio, traverses the Territory from east to west. The Salmon River makes its way through the Territory for 500 miles, while there are a large number of other streams and tributaries which furnish abundance of water for all purposes, including irrigation.

Mr. President, the State of Idaho has a great future. It is destined to be one of the richest States in the Union, capable of supporting millions of people. The agricultural statistics for 1889 show 4,000,000 bushels of wheat, over 2,000,000 bushels of oats, 1,150,000 bushels of barley, over 1,000,000 bushels of potatoes, and that there were raised quantities of other agricultural products. The mines of the Territory produced during the year 1889 $17,344,600 of gold, silver, lead, and copper. Over one hundred and fifty millions have been taken from the mines in Idaho.

It is abreast of the times in educational work, its public schools are worthy of any community, old or young, and it does not seem to me that there is any point of view from which the question can be examined which does not force a conclusion that it is our duty to pass the bill under consideration and thereby admit the State.

Much has been said against the female-suffrage provision of the Wyoming constitution. The constitution of Idaho does not contain such a provision. Whatever may be the wisdom or unwisdom of that provision, it is not in this constitution.

For my own part, I think worse things can happen to this country than that woman suffrage should be adopted by the States, though I do not think the women of the land desire it. The denial of the right of suffrage to a great class of citizens upon whom it has been conferred by the Constitution is fraught with greater danger than the conferral of that right upon the women of the land. But I do not desire to say more on that question at present, except that by our vote on the admission of Wyoming we neither affirm nor deny the wisdom of that provision of the Wyoming constitution.

Mr. PAYNE. May I interrupt the Senator to ask him if in that vote he and his party did not directly and precisely approve of that provision?

Mr. CULLOM. I do not understand that we did. We simply pass the bill that admits the State into the Union, and it happens to be in the constitution. Of course the Government accepts the constitution, but by that declaration that we make I do not understand that the Senate or anybody in it is specifically avowing his approval of every item in the constitution under which it comes in.

Mr. PAYNE. I only desire to call the attention of the Senator from Illinois to the language used in the legislation adopted by the Senate. It is that we "approve, ratify, and confirm" that constitution.

Mr. CULLOM. So we do, and so it has been done in every other instance in the admission of States, but I still insist that by that declaration we do not commit ourselves to the proposition that we are in favor of woman suffrage or any other item involved in the constitution.

Mr. President, I shall say no more on the question of the admission of Idaho; I believe the case is fully made out in favor of her admission into the Union as a State.

A few words touching the general condition, resources, and future of the great country west of the Missouri River, and I shall close.

I do this because I have felt that the country scarcely realizes the wonderful development and resources of our territory west of the Missouri River.

Who regrets to-day the admission into the Union of Kansas, called the central State of the American Union, lying on the western border of the Missouri River? It had about the same population in numbers at the date of its admission as is now to be found in each of the proposed States of Wyoming and Idaho. I need not dwell upon the wonderful growth and development of that State in population and wealth since the date of its admission in 1861. It has already become one of the great Commonwealths of the nation.

Look at Nebraska, lying to the north of her, admitted into the Union March 1, 1867, with an estimated population of 60,000, with its eastern border upon the Missouri River. The State has rapidly grown in population and wealth, until to-day its farms are sufficient to fill the granaries of the world, almost; and its greatest city, Omaha, compares in magnificence with the great cities of the oldest States in the Union.

We are all familiar with the two Dakotas recently admitted into the Union. But a few years ago they were uninhabited by white men; now together containing within their limits over 700,000 intelligent, enterprising people developing the resources of those two great States, making them the homes of the highest civilization.

Wyoming and Idaho have already been referred to and have been shown to possess great capabilities for wealth and for the comfort and happiness of man. The resources of Wyoming in coal and oil will prove a marvel to the American people and to the world in a very few years.

Montana and Washington are great empires in territory, rich in mines and forests and valleys, and destined to become the homes at no distant day of millions of free and happy people.

Nevada has often been referred to in this body as an argument against the admission of other new States on the Pacific coast or in the region of the Rocky Mountains. It was admitted into the Union in October, 1864. It has produced hundreds of millions of dollars of gold and silver. Few if any mines have been found in the world equal to the Comstock and other mines in Nevada. I believe not less than $600,000,000 have been dug out of the mines of that State. Nevada, it is true, has not advanced in population of late, but the time will come when the lands of that State will be subject in great part to irrigation and it will become a wealthy and populous State.

California and Oregon, bordering on the Pacific Ocean on the west, the first admitted into the Union in 1850 and the other in 1859, are rapidly becoming great States and are producing vast quantities of agricultural products and fruits, and each contains within its borders great seaport and other cities.

The Pacific coast in a few years will be as attractive in its great cities as is now the Atlantic coast. These great States since the days of railroads are growing in population and wealth and are already the homes of the highest civilization.

Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate by a reference to but one more State.

Colorado was admitted into the Union in 1876, the centennial year of our national independence. Those who do not travel westward can scarcely realize what can be found in that State. We all know it to be a great mining State, giving to the world millions of the precious metals every year; but you will be astonished when I tell you that 180,000 car-loads of freight came into the city of Denver in 1889. You may be astonished when I tell you that 34,400 car-loads of agricultural produce, valued at $12,000,000, came to that city from Kansas and Nebraska. You may be surprised when I tell you that 1,800 car-loads of fruit were taken to that city from California.

The city of Denver contains 100,000 people, and it is said that Bishop Warren, of the Methodist Church, stated publicly that the finest church building of the United States belonging to that great church organization stands in that beautiful city; and it is said also that in educational facilities the city of Denver stands No. 3 in the list of all the cities of the Union.

I might refer to Utah as possessing great resources, with nothing to hinder its development and early statehood but that blighting institution, polygamous Mormonism, which I trust and believe is in process of ultimate extinction.

Mr. President, I have taken occasion to briefly refer to the great section of our common country lying west of the Missouri River, to its resources, development, and progress, because I have sometimes felt that the people of the older States, East and South, do not fully realize the extent, the growth, and the grandeur of that part of the Union. Its agricultural land, its plains, and valleys will soon be settled and cultivated; its mountains will be explored and its mines developed. Let not Congress hinder the march of progress by denying to any portion of the people of that great section rights to which they show themselves to be entitled as American citizens. The prosperity of the whole country is what we all seek and for which we should all as representatives of the people labor.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 185) to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

REPORT OF LIBRARIAN OF CONGRESS.

Mr. EVARTS, from the Committee on the Library, submitted the annual report of the Librarian of Congress, exhibiting the progress of the Library during the calendar year 1889.

He also, from the same committee, reported the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the annual report of the Librarian of Congress be printed, and that 500 additional copies with covers be printed for the use of the Librarian.

EXTENSION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the joint resolution just received from the other House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the joint resolution (H. Res. 185) to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government; which was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all appropriations for the necessary operations of the Government and of the District of Columbia, under existing laws, which shall remain unprovided for on the 30th day of June, 1890, be, and they are hereby, continued and made available for a period of thirty days from and after that date, unless the regular appropriations provided therefor in bills now pending in Congress shall have been previously made for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, and a sufficient amount is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to carry on the same: Provided, That no greater amount shall be expended for such operations than will be in the same proportion to the appropriations for the fiscal year 1890 as thirty days' time bears to the whole of said fiscal year: Provided further, That the total expenditures for the whole of the fiscal year 1891 under the several appropriations hereby continued shall not exceed in the aggregate the amounts finally appropriated therefor in the several bills now pending, except in cases where a change is made in the annual, monthly, or per diem compensation, or in the numbers of officers, clerks, or other persons authorized to be employed by the several appropriations hereby continued, in which cases the amounts authorized to be expended shall equal thirty three-hundred-and-sixty-fifths of the appropriations for the fiscal year 1890, and three-hundred-and-thirty-five three-hundred-and-sixty-fifths of the appropriations contained in the several bills now pending when the same shall have been finally passed, unless the salaries or compensation of any officer shall be increased or diminished without changing the grade or the duties thereof, in which case such salary or compensation shall relate to the entire fiscal year and run from the beginning thereof.

Mr. ALLISON. This is the usual and necessary joint resolution in case appropriations have not been made for the fiscal year prior to June 30, and it is necessary that it should be passed and receive the signature of the President this day. So I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution may be considered at this time.

There being no objection the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. SALLIE H. MICHLER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1546) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Sallie M. Michler, widow of the late Bvt. Brig. Gen. Nathaniel Michler, United States Army.

The amendments of the House of Representatives were, in line 2, in the name of Mrs. Sallie M. Michler, to strike out "M" and insert "H," and to amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Sallie H. Michler, widow of the late Bvt. Brig. Gen. Nathaniel Michler."

Mr. SAWYER. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments. They merely correct the name.

The amendments were concurred in.

JAMES H. SHOWALTER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1741) granting increase of pension to James H. Showalter.

Mr. PADDOCK. I move that the Senate non-concur in the House amendments and ask a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. PADDOCK, Mr. MOODY, and Mr. FAULKNER were appointed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPIERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10716) making appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. FUNSTON, Mr. CONGER, and Mr. HATCH managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 11293) making an appropriation to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for compensation of members of the House of Representatives and Delegates from Territories; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 578) in relation to oaths in pension and other cases;

A bill (H. R. 2361) for the relief of Asa Ellis, collector of internal revenue for the first collection district of California;

A bill (H. R. 3886) to incorporate the North River Bridge Company and to authorize the construction of a bridge and approaches at New York City across the Hudson River, to regulate commerce in and over such bridge between the States of New York and New Jersey, and to establish such bridge a military and post road;

A bill (H. R. 8149) to increase the limit of cost of the public building authorized by act of Congress approved March 2, 1889, to be erected at Fort Worth, Tex.;

A bill (H. R. 9677) to authorize the county of Pulaski, in the State of Georgia, to maintain a high wagon and foot bridge across the Ocmulgee River at or near Hawkinsville, in the State of Georgia;

A joint resolution (H. Res. 183) to provide for the unexpended balance, $99,439.07, for discharging claims of letter-carriers for extra compensation under the eight-hour law, approved May 24, 1888, and appropriated for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1888; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 185) to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government.

ADMISSION OF IDAHO.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the bill making appropriations for the District of Columbia.

Mr. PLATT. That motion, if carried, would not displace the pending order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not at all.

Mr. PLATT. If the Senator from Kansas will permit me, I should like to say in regard to the bill for the admission of Idaho that I hoped it might be considered and concluded this afternoon, but this being the 30th of June has been necessarily given up very much to appropriation bills and conference reports, and I shall not press the bill further to-night, but I will ask the Senate to kindly consider it to-morrow and to dispose of it to-morrow. I think there will be no objection to that. I have heard of one or two Senators on the other side who desire to speak upon it, and after some conference with the Territorial Committee on the other side I think we may safely conclude that we can get a vote to-morrow afternoon.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator does not ask unanimous consent?

Mr. PLATT. No; I do not ask unanimous consent for an agreement to that effect.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 11293) making an appropriation to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for compensation of Members of the House of Representatives and Delegates from Territories was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

DISTRICT APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. 3711) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, and for other purposes. The report of the committee of conference has been read and is printed at length in the RECORD of Saturday's proceedings. The question is on concurring in the report.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the last amendment which appears in the report. I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment referred to will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Amendment numbered 165: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 165, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment insert the following amendment:

"SEC. 3. That any street-railroad company in the District of Columbia authorized to run cars drawn by horses which has changed or may change its motive power on any of its lines now constructed to cable or electricity, or change its rails in accordance with the provisions of law, shall have the right to issue and sell, at the market price thereof, stock of said company to an amount necessary to cover the cost of making said changes; the cost of said changes and the amount of said stock sold, together with the price per share, to be fully set forth under the oath of the president of said company, and filed with the commissioners of the District. And any company availing itself of the privilege herein granted shall within eighteen months wholly dispense with horses as motive power on all portions of its line, and substitute therefor the power provided for in the 'act making appropriations for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia,' approved March 2, 1889, or other modern motive power which shall be approved by the commissioners of the District of Columbia, not involving the use of overhead wires.

"SEC. 4. That any street-railroad company operating its lines in the District of Columbia which during the calendar year 1889 earned, declared, and paid dividends on its capital stock exceeding 10 per cent. upon the face thereof, shall hereafter sell to all persons eight tickets for and at the price of 25 cents, each ticket to be good for one continuous passage over its entire line, and to entitle the holder thereof to passage on any line within the scope of this section."

And the Senate agreed to the same.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, as I am to a certain extent, I think, chiefly responsible for the introduction of this legislative provision in an appropriation bill, I wish to call the careful attention of the Senate to the additions made by the committee of conference to the provision the substance of which was introduced by myself.

I have no serious objection to the modification made to the clause that I first submitted to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], but the second clause of that amendment practically abrogates and nullifies the laws creating corporations running street-cars in this city. I think it would be safe to say that no corporation could run a railroad and pay the current expenses under the second section of the amendment inserted by the conference committee. It relates to a matter that was never sent to the conference committee and it is a new subject-matter entirely.

In order to give the Senate the exact condition of this matter, I ought to state that I concurred in a debate in the last session of Congress in pretty severe criticism upon the fact that the street-railroads of this city did not keep up with the times, did not keep pace with improvements in railroads of the same class in the other cities of the country. Thereupon I was called upon by an officer of one of these companies, and he said they were perfectly ready, at least his company was perfectly ready, to proceed to adopt modern devices, new motive power, in the conduct of these railroads, but that they had no authority to do it; that they were unable to get the authority.

I was very much surprised at that. I said I had no doubt that Congress would cheerfully give any railroad company authorized by law to construct a street line the authority to adopt any modern device for motive power, but that there was a strong sentiment in Congress against overhead wires, and that had been expressed by a very vigorous debate here led by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

Thereupon I introduced in the last session of the last Congress an amendment which was embodied in the appropriation act for the District of Columbia, and which provided:

That any company authorized by law to run cars propelled by horses within the District of Columbia is hereby authorized to substitute for horses electric power by storage or independent electrical batteries or under-ground wire, or under-ground cables moved by steam power, on the whole or any portion of its roadway, with authority to purchase and use any terminal grounds and facilities necessary for the purpose; and any such street-railway company electing to substitute such power on any part of its tracks or road-beds on the streets of the District of Columbia shall, before doing so, cause such part of its road-beds to be laid with a flat grooved rail and make level with the surface of the streets upon each side of said tracks or road-beds, so that no obstruction shall be presented to vehicles passing over said tracks.

This provision was simply an authority for any District street railroad that chose to adopt modern expedients to run a railroad. There were other provisions added, but it is not necessary to read those; they were added either in the House or the Senate. This provision was adopted by the unanimous consent of both Houses of Congress, so far as I now know. It simply gave to any railroad choosing to use modern motive power the right to do so.

Under that provision one of the railroads of this city, and the chief one, probably, in point of length of road and magnitude, did during the last summer and up to the winter construct about three miles and a half or three miles of double-track cable road, said to be very good, perhaps one of the best roads of the kind in the United States, and it is now in successful operation.

Pending this, and while it was going on, the same gentleman who brought to my attention the necessity of a grant of power called upon me and said that under their charter as it existed they had authority to issue so much stock, $500,000 I believe was the amount, and $500,000 of bonds. As a matter of course, they could only pay for this new improvement by the issue of stock or bonds. They were advised by their attorneys that they could not issue any more stock than the amount already issued, $500,000, and they therefore issued bonds solely for the construction of this road, which cost, I am told, from $750,000 to $1,000,000 for the road-bed and for the necessary buildings. He called my attention to that fact and asked me if I thought that Congress would be willing to give them authority, instead of issuing it all in bonds, to issue a portion of it in stock, and I told him I thought there would be no objection to such a proposition.

The ground of complaint was that they could issue only $500,000 of stock, and as they had already issued $500,000 of bonds under the old régime they were compelled to issue something in the neighborhood of a million dollars of bonds for the Seventh street road, and as they intended during the next season to go on and complete their line of road, which I believe was about 15 miles of single track or 7½ miles of double track, they would require to pay for those roads about two million and a half of dollars, and they did not like to overload their corporation with so large an amount of bonds, but wished to have the authority to issue a portion of it in stock, the stock as a matter of course to be divided and taken by the old stockholders instead of bonds.

Thereupon he gave me the draught of a provision. I took it to several members of the District Committee and I found no objection to it. They said they could see no reason why it should not be adopted. I communicated it to the Senator from Kansas and it seemed to meet his approval, and he had the assent of the Committee on Appropriations and I think without objection, by unanimity in the Senate, that provision was inserted as it stood originally in the bill which passed the Senate, simply authorizing these railroad companies instead of issuing bonds for the entire expense of these new improvements to issue at their option either stock or bonds. That was the provision which was sent to the committee of conference.

Although I do not think the committee of conference have improved the simple proposition that I mentioned, which met the sanction of every one here, I do not object to the details in regard to it. They have added some provisions about it requiring this new work to be done in eighteen months. Whether it can be done in that time or not, I do not know. The railroad companies' men take their chances with that. They have also provided that this stock shall be sold at public auction. It would be very difficult, indeed, to ascertain the value of this stock, because all additional stock issued necessarily depreciates the value of that which has been previously issued, especially if it was above par.

Therefore it has been usual in such cases for companies to allow their stockholders to subscribe for the new stock and also to subscribe for the new bonds. That is a matter entirely for them, because the stockholders own the road. I do not, however, object or enter into any controversy in regard to the provisions and the modifications made of that clause of this amendment.

I will ask the Secretary to again read what is called section 4, the second clause of the proposed amendment, reported by the committee of conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the section indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 4. That any street-railroad company operating its lines in the District of Columbia, which during the calendar year 1888 earned, declared, and paid dividends on its capital stock exceeding 10 per cent. upon the face thereof, shall hereafter sell to all persons eight tickets for and at the price of 25 cents, each ticket to be good for one continuous passage over its entire line and to entitle the holder thereof to passage on any line within the scope of this section.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, Mr. President, it will be observed that the fare on this road is reduced from its present rate of 5 cents to 4 cents for a single passage. Now they have to give six tickets for 25 cents, when they are purchased in the form of tickets, and I am told that the great body of fares is paid by tickets—three-fourths or more. So the present charge for running over any point on the road to any other point of the road, with the right to connect with any branch, is 4½ cents.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Four and one-sixth cents.

Mr. SHERMAN. The president of the company said about 4½ cents. They record the number of passengers they carry, and they know how much their income is, and they say it yields them about 4½ cents. This bill reduces it down to 3 cents, or, in other words, eight tickets for 25 cents, which would be 3½ cents. To show that that would bankrupt this company, although it is a strong company, let me give you the actual figures, for I have before me the official report made by this company in Miscellaneous Document 161, sent to the House of Representatives.

I find the entire income of this railroad derived from passenger receipts—and that is the only income it has—is $864,233.45. The reduction made in this bill is more than one-fourth, between one-fourth and one-third, as you will see, so that, taking the same number of passengers traveling on the road next year as traveled last year and taking the passenger receipts as the basis and reducing the passenger receipts one-fourth, it would be a reduction of its income of $145,000 a year, which would be the loss of revenue to this company.

When it is remembered that, although this is the most prosperous street-railway company in the city of Washington, the highest dividend ever paid to its stockholders was $100,000 a year for one year and the interest upon their bonds was only forty-odd thousand dollars, the loss of revenue here would take away all the money that has heretofore been divided among the stockholders and all the money which they pay for interest on their bonds, and leave a less sum per annum than the actual expenses of running the road.

Here are the expenses given, the sum total of the ordinary expenses of running the road, and the total expense, excluding the cable railway, and the dividends. The total expense of running the road was $515,162, which is more by $25,000 than the entire receipts of the road would be upon the basis proposed by this conference report.

Now, when you remember that there is no city in the United States among the multitude of omnibus lines or street-car lines or any other sort of transit of that kind where the fare is less than it is in Washington; when you see the actual expense of this road, which is admitted to be managed with great economy, and perhaps a little too much economy, so that the actual expenses of the road will be twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars more than the receipts will be, it is apparent that it will bankrupt the company and disable them not only from paying dividends upon their stock, but from meeting the interest upon their debt. And remember that this proposition comes at a time when the company has expended nearly a million dollars in building one of the best cable roads probably in the United States and when it is further called upon to expend about two million and a half of dollars to complete its improvements by making a magnificent line of railway on the Avenue and on Fourteenth street, etc., running from Georgetown through. I will venture to say, considering the length of the line run, that there is no railroad in the United States that could be conducted anywhere on this basis, because you must remember that this line runs not only from Georgetown to the navy-yard, but every ticket carries with it the right to go on any of the side lines to the river, or to the head of Seventh street, or the head of Fourteenth street, and it is practically impossible for any street-car line to subsist under a rate of 3 cents a passenger.

I know that in foreign countries the rates are higher than this. The rates in Paris, if I remember aright, are from 20 centimes to 30 centimes, 4 cents and 6 cents, and the 4-cent passengers ride above. In England I think the rate is about the same or a little higher. In Philadelphia I am told the rate of fare is 6 cents, with 1 cent additional for a transfer check. In New York the rate is 5 cents per passenger.

Now, Mr. President, what I desire is to call the attention of the Senate to this. I think certainly the conferees acting upon the question did not wish to do an injustice. As I was somewhat instrumental, I may say, in proposing these legislative provisions, which I did for the purpose of securing the best possible motive power for the cars in this city, I should dislike to see these people when they are just engaged in carrying out great improvements ruined and injured in their property. I look upon it, without imputing any such intention to the conferees, as in the nature of a confiscation.

I trust the Senate will allow this matter to go back to the committee of conference and allow them to reconsider it in view of the facts I have stated. I have no doubt they desire to do justice. My own opinion is that this amendment ought to be confined simply to an authority to be given to these companies to issue stock in proportion to the bonds issued, so that the amount of stock would be something like equal to the bonds. It would be better if it was all represented by stock, better for the company, better for the people, and better for the District of Columbia. Each of these companies should be represented by enough stock to be about the value of the property.

According to the statement contained in this paper they expended before they built the cable line about $1,100,000, one-half of which is represented by bonds and the other half by stock. Upon the date of this report, which was made the 1st of January last, the cost of this property was $1,600,000, which included a portion of the expenses of the cable road, and is now increased, I am told, to about $2,000,000, because all this expenditure has been made since the 1st of January. If they are allowed to go on according to their present plan and complete this railroad, the aggregate cost of the road will probably be about four or four and a half million dollars, according to the statement given me.

There can be no motive in these stockholders to do injustice to each other. They own the property. All I desire is to see that their vested rights shall not be taken away from them. The power of Congress, undoubtedly, to change and modify this charter ought not to be used so as to do injustice to men who have invested their money under the laws of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It appears to me the fundamental difficulty is that the Senate on a previous occasion when it passed this bill undertook on an appropriation bill to insert a distinct and separate piece of legislation that had nothing whatever to do with appropriating the moneys of the District and of the United States for carrying on the operations of government here. The Senate conferees are not responsible for that, but the Senate is; and it sent this subject of this street railway or any others, whatever they might be, as everybody perfectly well knows—the Senate with its eyes open sent it to a conference, because it put in an amendment of a purely legislative character, that had nothing whatever to do with the business of the Committee on Appropriations, but had to do with the duties and business of the Committee on the District of Columbia; put it into the bill here in the Senate apparently; possibly it was reported by the committee, but I think not.

That is an error that we are falling into all the time. I have seen on former occasions, and we may again see when we come to the legislative bill on the occasion this year of appropriations for the judicial establishment of the United States, where the supposed business of the Committee on Appropriations is and its real business—and it does not try to get out of it, I agree—to make an appropriation for the payment of judges and marshals, and so on, and so on, under existing law.

Mr. GORMAN. It was not reported from the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senate put in this piece of legislation, so that we can not very well complain of the conferees of the Senate for having dealt with the subject. They may have dealt with it erroneously, but it never ought to have been here at all. This illustrates what we shall have to come to in some way at this session or the next, in contriving some means of possibly excluding from the matter of paying money out of the Treasury to subserve the purposes of existing law and existing duties the various schemes of legislation which may have a more or less remote relation with the moneys to be appropriated.

Some Senator, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, for instance, or whoever he may be, or some member of the House of Representatives, or some lawyer rushes into the room of the Committee on Appropriations and says, "Here is just a little bit of a matter that I should like to have you just put in in connection with this expenditure, that hereafter the commissioners of the circuit courts shall do so and so," or "that the judge shall do so and so," or "that the rule for charging juries shall be so and so," or that "there shall be another assistant marshal or assistant clerk" and so on, and somehow or other once in awhile it comes out that we find out, nobody's attention being called to it, and the Committee on Appropriations doing their very best with the light they have, and having all this responsibility of every Department of the Government, put in a piece of legislation that is found out the next year to be altogether injudicious and altogether unwise; and the great majority of the people of the country who think anything about it or know anything about it, the lawyers and judges particularly, begin to write to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives and the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate inquiring "What in the world did you pass any such a law for?"

Well, the chairmen of the respective committees respond: "We did not know anything about it; we never heard of it." There is a statement in the New Testament somewhere that we never so much as heard that there was such a law. The Committee on Appropriations have done it not in undertaking to absorb or grasp jurisdiction, but in yielding to somebody's importunity and not having the opportunity and time, nor is it their mission, to understand the whole scope of the workings of the judicial establishment.

I only speak of that to illustrate, for it goes all around, and so I say the evil of this whole business is that the Committee on Appropriations does not vigorously set itself against all petitions and applications and beggings by myself or anybody else, and confine itself to doing the duty that is imputed to it by the rules, and that is to recommend the appropriation of the necessary moneys of the United States to carry on the Government as it is, and not to undertake to branch out into considering what is the best policy about public lands, what is the best policy about the Territories, what is the best policy about agriculture, what is the best policy about foreign relations, what is the best policy about the judicial establishment, and so on, and so on, and so on. That committee would have work enough to do if it would resist all our importunities in these respects and stand by what would then be a clear and definite mission that it had in hand.

So much for the general observation which I am compelled to make in view of this very thing. Now, we have the District appropriation bill and we have a Committee on the District of Columbia, one of whose missions it is, clearly and undoubtedly, to deal with the administration and behavior of these railways, and it is the mission of no other committee. All that the Committee on Appropriations has to do is to provide what money it thinks is necessary to carry out the District establishment as it is. If it is necessary to have another street railway, it is not the mission of the Committee on Appropriations to determine whether that is wise or not wise. If the Senate determine it to be wise, it is the committee's mission to report the proper appropriation to carry it on, if any appropriation is necessary. It is the mission of the Committee on the District, and so on round and round.

But the Senate, I say—it is not the fault of the committee—has put into this bill a piece of pure and simple legislation, and the conferees on the part of the Senate taking that as the instruction of the Senate have undertaken to put it into a shape that on the whole they thought would be wise. Whether it is wise or not is open to great doubt. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] has shown, if his figures are correct, that the effect of it as to the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company is that dividends must stop and the payment of interest or the payment of their bonds must stop unless they can get a much larger patronage on this reduced rate of 3 cents and a little over during the next year.

Well, nobody wants to do that, I take it, as arbitrary and obnoxious as that railway company has been and all its compeers almost, and perhaps all, paying no attention to the law which, for instance, requires them to have the pavements between their tracks at all crossings of streets and on the outside conform to the street pavements, so as to give the people who go in carriages—and by carriages I include the poorest horse cart of the country market-woman as well as the landau of the President of the United States—perhaps it is safer to say, so as to give all vehicles a safe passage. There is not a railway in the whole city that cares anything more about that positive requirement of Congress than I do about what the new moon will be next year; and in only one or two instances when the commissioners of the District, whose business it is to enforce these laws, have had their special attention called to some of these crossings that had become absolute nuisances, that they have in some way or other persuaded one or two of these companies to fix one particular place of crossing according to law, and all the others are entirely outside of the law.

I had one experience myself, which I believe I have mentioned once before, and it is worth mentioning again. I applied to the District commissioners in respect of one crossing that interested me personally no more than a dozen other persons who passed it every day, and I was coolly told by the commissioners that they would look after the matter and see what could be done. Months and months went by and nothing was done, and then I humbly appealed to the railway corporation itself, and immediately, I suppose out of grace and favor and not out of any obligation of law, that particular nuisance was corrected.

So, as I say, I have no special sympathy with these corporations, who seem to be masters of the commissioners and masters of the District in respect of what they wish to do or do not wish to do, as the case may be, and who pay no attention to the requirements of law about paying their assessments in regard to public improvements along their lines where they are required to pay them. But when, as my friend from Ohio says, by the conference report we come to deal with one particular corporation—no matter how bad it has been heretofore—it ought to be in this particular instance treated with justice; and if we are going to say on a conference report and in an appropriation bill that this corporation shall carry passengers at a rate that will not pay, we ought to consider it twice.

That is all I have to say.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, I am glad to have the opportunity to state just how this whole matter came, and I am very glad before I come to make that statement that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] has made his remarks. As the bill was about passing the Senate the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] came to me and handed me the amendment, as he himself has stated, as it appears in the bill at page 9, in these words:

SEC. 4. That any street-railroad company in the District of Columbia now authorized to run cars drawn by horses, which shall change its motive power on any of its lines to cable or electricity, in accordance with the provisions of law, shall have the right to issue stock for an amount equal to the cost of making said change, said amount to be approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

I objected first to offering the amendment, saying that it was legislation, that it had not the sanction of the Appropriations Committee, and I thought, while it seemed proper enough, it was not proper to put it upon an appropriation bill. I finally submitted the matter to all the members of the District Committee who were present in the Chamber, and to several members of the Appropriations Committee, all of whom gave their assent, some of them saying about it that it was a very excellent thing and ought to be done. It was then moved by me and adopted.

The Senator from Ohio, in responding to my objection to putting it into the bill, said—and that had great force with me—that the appropriation bill already carried a specific provision requiring the railroad companies to do certain things which required the outlay of money, and that this was the best way of providing the money. We thought so too, and that therefore it was in the line of what already had been done by the sanction of both Houses upon appropriation bills.

While I am on that point and looking right to my friend from Vermont, I will call his attention to the fact that he himself had as much to do as any other member of the Senate in fashioning the amendment which was adopted on the appropriation law of 1889 whereby these railroad companies were required to substitute grooved rails for the present rails and given the opportunity to substitute electric or other power for horse power. The Senator from Vermont shakes his head, but I will convict him out of the RECORD if he needs conviction.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You will have to convict me by the RECORD.

Mr. PLUMB. I will do so. My recollection is very distinct because it was against my protest all the way through. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] moved the amendment, and it finally was substantially agreed to by consent in the Senate that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] should put that into shape to be adopted, and it was debated here for hours in the Senate, the Senator from Vermont participating in the debate, the whole thing being subject to objection, and no objection by him or anybody else being interposed; otherwise it could not possibly have gone into the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is immensely mistaken.

Mr. PLUMB. Not a bit of it. I will convict the Senator out of the RECORD and will establish the truth of every word I have said about it.

The Senator from Ohio, if my recollection serves me, offered a part of the amendment giving authority to these companies to change their motive power; but the legislation in which the Senator from Vermont was interested, and which he did his best to have adopted, and it was adopted, and he did not object, but advocated it, was an amendment putting burdens upon these companies in the way of requiring them to change their rails and to accommodate themselves to the conditions imposed in the bill; and, if I am not mistaken, he made the statement he made to-day about the difficulty he had in having them comply with the law, and how finally, as a matter of grace to himself, they did certain things that he thought they ought to do.

That measure of legislation was the subject of great consideration in the conference which ensued between the two Houses. I remember very well going to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, with whom I felt privileged to advise, and saying that I thought we ought to give it all up because of the apparently irreconcilable differences between the Senate and the House conferees as to the terms, and it appeared almost impossible to get an agreement. But he said to me in view of the unanimous action of the Senate and the apparent determination to do something, and this being within reach, it seemed as though we ought to make an extra effort to get it in, if possible, and that effort resulted in the adoption of the law to be found on page 797 of the Statutes of 1889.

I will ask that the provision be inserted in my remarks at this point, as it is too long to read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The provision of the statutes referred to by the Senator from Kansas will be inserted, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

The provision is as follows:

That any company authorized by law to run cars propelled by horses within the District of Columbia is hereby authorized to substitute for horses electric power by storage or independent electrical batteries or underground wire, or underground cables moved by steam power on the whole or any portion of its roadway, with authority to purchase and use any terminal grounds and facilities necessary for the purpose; and any such street railway company electing to substitute such power on any part of its tracks or road-beds on the streets of the District of Columbia shall, before doing so, cause such part of its road-beds to be laid with a flat grooved rail and made level with the surface of the streets upon each side of said tracks or road-beds, so that no obstruction shall be presented to vehicles passing over said tracks: Provided, That, in the event said companies, or either of them, shall fail for the period of two years from the passage of this act to exercise the powers and privileges hereinbefore given, such companies are hereby required to cause said rails and road-beds to be relaid with the flat grooved rail hereinbefore mentioned, so as to be level with the streets upon each side of said tracks or road-beds, and the cost of making the changes hereinbefore required shall be paid by the corporations or persons owning or operating said street railroads, and if, after being notified by the commissioners of the District of Columbia, in writing, to comply with the terms of this act, the said corporations, or either of them, shall not within ninety days thereafter begin the work required and complete the same within a reasonable time, not more than twelve months from the expiration of said period of ninety days, it shall be the duty of the commissioners to cause the necessary changes in said rails and road-beds to be made as soon as practicable; and shall issue certificates of indebtedness against the property, real or personal, of such railway company, which certificates shall bear interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum until paid, and which, until they are paid, shall remain and be a lien upon the property on or against which they are issued, together with the franchise of said company; and if the said certificates are not paid within one year the said commissioners of the District of Columbia may proceed to sell the property against which they are issued, or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay the amount due, such sale to be first duly advertised daily for one week in some newspaper published in the city of Washington, and to be sold at public auction to the highest bidder: Provided further, That after the passage of this act no other rail than that herein mentioned shall be laid by any street-railway company in the streets of Washington and Georgetown, and all companies granted franchises or extensions by the Fiftieth Congress shall have extension of one year's time within which to lay their tracks. So much of the charters of the street-railway companies of the District of Columbia as is inconsistent with this section is hereby repealed: Provided further, That the foregoing requirements as to motive power, rails, and road-bed shall not apply to street railroads outside the city of Georgetown and the boundary limits of the city of Washington: And provided, That the authority hereinbefore granted in each and every particular shall be exercised only with the approval of the commissioners of the District of Columbia, expressed by resolution of said board.

Mr. PLUMB. The amendment under consideration presented by the Senator from Ohio had this merit, that it was germane to that which the Senate had done in the first instance led by the Senator from Vermont, and that, the two Houses having concurred in it, it had met with apparently universal favor, and it was being operated under by the railroads themselves, and it seemed as though, while acceding a privilege to them apparently, at the same time it provided a better method of raising the money necessary to carry out the law of 1889 than would be the case if they were to issue bonds; and so the amendment was offered and adopted and went into conference.

Mr. President, when we came to get into conference on that amendment some changes were suggested, as was natural. But there came to the knowledge of the conferees this state of facts: That one of the railroad companies of this city, for the purpose of providing itself with funds to make the change required by the law of 1889, had issued what they called convertible bonds, bonds drawing 5 or 6 per cent. interest, I do not know exactly, but not a very high rate of interest.

Mr. GORMAN. It was 5 per cent.

Mr. PLUMB. It is stated to be 5 per cent. by the Senator from Maryland and others near me. This was coupled with the agreement, as I understand, having more or less formality about it, but at all events something which conveyed the belief that these bonds were to be exchangeable for stock before their maturity and within some brief period of time; and the rather remarkable spectacle was exhibited of bonds drawing 5 per cent. going up in the market of the city of Washington to 290, nearly multiplying in value within a few months' time more than threefold; and of course it did not take long to put two and two together to the extent of seeing that this was because they were exchangeable under some peculiar circumstances yet to arise for stock which was worth three for one in the market, and thereby somebody was to make an enormous profit. I think the profit on the construction of the Seventh-street line alone, for which these bonds were issued, would have been not less than a million and a half of dollars, and that profit was to be made by simply the turn of the hand, with no more risk than any Senator would have in exchanging one gold dollar for another.

Mr. President, I do not begrudge these railroad companies the fair profits which they may make in compliance with law and in the service mutually of themselves and the public, but it did not seem fair—and I think I can safely appeal to the Senate on that point—that the law of Congress should be made a shelter of a speculation of that kind, whereby, without any risk whatever, within the brief period of two months, a handful of favored individuals should multiply their investment three or four fold, and, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] suggests, of course take it from the people of the District of Columbia or the people of the United States who travel over their railroad in the end.

That did not seem fair. It did seem perfectly fair, and does yet, that these companies, being under the command of the law to make certain large investments for the purpose of changing their plan and of putting down new rails and substituting new motive power for that now in use, in order that the public might be better accommodated, etc., and that it might be done under the command to do it within a brief period of time, should have authority to issue something upon which the money could be raised. They might not be able, some of them would certainly not be able, to pay for it out of their current revenues. It was the character of the improvement, which would be well described as permanent; and in all similar enterprises when anything of that kind is done it is done by the issue of bonds or stock or something else, in order that these investments may be made and the improvements made within a reasonable time, of course the future earnings of the road being applied to their payment.

But in this case the future earnings of the road are not pledged for the payment of the interest on the investment. But those who had managed this matter and who had got these bonds into their hands were to have paid back to them three dollars for one, and anything that after this was to be expended was to be done in that line hereafter, which would have resulted as to all the roads in this District of Columbia in making a profit of ten to fifteen million dollars. Rather a wholesome speculation that was!

Of course it has another phase. As the Senator from Ohio says, it was the money of the stockholders themselves and it was their own road. They own the road anyway, and whether they swapped stock worth $3 for a bond worth $1 is perhaps no concern of the public; and yet the public does guard with more or less of jealousy the issue of new stock and new bonds, because it is well known that they always make this an excuse for the maintenance of their road and also to give currency to operations whereby the investing public are often defrauded by buying stock that has a less value than it seems to have.

The conference committee came to the consideration of this bill with this knowledge—not at first, for it did not understand the matter in the beginning—but we finally agreed upon the substitute as section 4 which is contained in the report of the committee and which we thought was entirely fair to the public and fair to the railroads. And this is the way the conference arranged it:

SEC. 3. That any street-railroad company in the District of Columbia authorized to run cars drawn by horses, which has changed or may change its motive power on any of its lines now constructed—

The Senate will observe that we did not extend this privilege to railroads that might hereafter be created or to lines hereafter to be constructed, leaving all that question open and endeavoring to have this as far as possible relate to the lines which were under the command embodied in the law of 1889—to cable or electricity, or change its rails in accordance with the provisions of law, shall have the right to issue and sell, at the market price thereof, stock of said company to an amount necessary to cover the cost of making said changes, the cost of said changes and the amount of said stock sold, together with the price per share, to be fully set forth, under the oath of the president of said company, and filed with the Commissioners of the District.

Now, Mr. President, one result of that was just this, which I have stated as the result certain to follow the adoption of the amendment as originally proposed: Given the necessity of raising a million of dollars of money for the purpose of making these required changes, and the stock being worth $300 in the market, which I understand is about the market price of the stock of the principal railroad company here, the sale of $333,000 of the stock would raise the necessary money, and therefore there would only be $333,000 of the stock out to be a charge against the public that the public was to respond to in the shape of dividends.

But under the provision that went into the bill originally the company could issue $1,000,000 at par, which would be worth $3,000,000. That is the difference. They could issue $1,000,000 in place of $333,000, and that million dollars of stock would be worth from the moment it was issued $3,000,000, because, while it is true, as the Senator from Ohio said, if you flood the market with a large amount of stock it affects its value, at the same time the stockholders themselves would take it, and it would not necessarily go on the market, and, in addition to that, every dollar of the earning power of the railroad is to be enhanced in the end by this change of power.

Under the present operations of the law of 1889 with regard to the change of motive power, if they should remain as they are now, and the more especially if Congress should not charter competing lines of railroads, the stock of this railroad company—I use this by example, because it is spoken of, though what I have to say applies in a large measure to all of them—would be worth, in place of 3 to 1, 5 to 1. I have been told, on what I conceived to be good authority, that the Seventh-street line, which has been changed to a cable line, is earning more money than it ever earned before, and there has been a very large increase since that change, and not only an increase in the earnings, but a very considerable diminution in the expense of operation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You mean an increase of profits?

Mr. PLUMB. Yes; that is to say, there has been an increase in the gross earnings and a diminution of the expenditures, and not only a relative diminution, but an absolute diminution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That would not prove that there was an increase of the profits. That would depend upon the amount necessary to build this cable line compared with the former income. They might carry a thousand more passengers to-day and the daily cost might be $100 less, and yet there might be quite a loss on the capital necessary to do that thing.

Mr. PLUMB. I have it from what appeared to me to be fair authority. I may be mistaken.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I only wished to know what the Senator meant.

Mr. PLUMB. I mean the profits of operating the Seventh-street line to-day as compared with the time before the cable power was put in show an increase. When I say a profit, I mean a profit over and above the cost of the line and the cost of its operations.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Based upon what?

Mr. PLUMB. Based upon the actual capitalization. That is what I have been told and believe.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I only made the inquiry. I hope it is true.

Mr. PLUMB. Now, Mr. President, when we got that far in this conference and having before us all the time the controversy relating to the law of 1889, having before us these constant complaints which are being made and the instruction given to us last year practically to agree upon something which would do the public some good in connection with the management of these railroad lines, it was somewhat natural that we should follow it by this other provision:

And any company availing itself of the privilege herein granted shall, within eighteen months, wholly dispense with horses as motive power on all portions of its lines and substitute therefor the power provided for in the act making appropriations for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia, approved March 2, 1889, or other modern motive power, which shall be approved by the commissioners of the District of Columbia, not involving the use of overhead wires.

Mr. FAULKNER. I should like to ask the Senator what is his construction there as to "availing itself of the privilege herein granted," as applied to the question of changing the form of rail. Suppose they only change the form of rails and do not change the motive power, does it still require them to do away with horse power if they change the rail?

Mr. PLUMB. Undoubtedly. If any railroad company, unless I wholly mistake the force of language, avails itself of the privilege of this section for the purpose of issuing any new stock, it thereby becomes bound within eighteen months to dispense entirely with the use of horses as a motive power over all portions of its lines. That is my construction of it, and I think that is the only one that is correct.

After that had been tentatively agreed upon and put into shape what occurs in section 4 was suggested.

Mr. President, I have no knowledge whatever in regard to these railroads except as I encounter them physically, or as disclosed by the statistics of the District, or as disclosed in the reports which they have made, which I have not examined with any care. There was on that committee a member who represents a district which adjoins territorially the District of Columbia, Hon. Mr. McCOMAS, from Maryland, and the people of the city of Washington are largely his constituents. His voice in the Committee on Appropriations in regard to matters of this kind and in conference has unusual weight.

The other members of the committee have been connected with this subject-matter also fully as long as any member of the subcommittee on the part of the Senate, and they seemed to think that these companies were making money and that if any company was making so much money as is named in this section, to wit, 10 per cent. on its capital, the time had arrived when they might fairly divide with the public the profits from it, and the suggestion therefore was made by them and acceded to by us that this provision in regard to selling eight tickets for a quarter of a dollar might be incorporated.

It may possibly have been done without as much consideration of the possible effect upon the fortunes or the finances of the company as it ought to have had, but the conference was a protracted one and this item gave rise to a great deal of delay and a great deal of discussion, with the result which I have named.

It is not fair to compare the financial condition of that company at present with what it was last year as an evidence of what will result from the operation of this provision of law if it shall become a law, but it is the universal experience that where rates of fare are cut down the travel enormously increases.

The late President of the United States, Mr. Cleveland, vetoed a bill when he was governor of the State of New York which was passed by the Legislature of that State requiring the elevated railroads of the city of New York to carry passengers for 5 cents, and yet within two years from the time he vetoed that bill the companies themselves of their own motion reduced the fare to 5 cents and made money by it. Simply looking at it as a matter-of-fact man and with the desire, of course, to do no injustice to anybody, he said these companies are not earning as much as they are entitled to under the law, and I can not see that it will be fair for them now to be required to carry passengers at 5 cents; but the companies were wiser, and, being composed of men who are not in the habit of giving something when they do not get anything in return, they reduced the fares first for certain hours in the morning and certain hours of the evening, in order that the laboring men might have the advantage of it, and, following it in a year or so by a reduction from 10 to 5 cents, found their revenues increased; and, as the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] suggests, the companies of this District have had a similar experience; that is, as they have reduced their fares they have found that their earnings have increased.

I am not going to say that I know this will come; I do not know anything about it; but I say that, unless all human experience is worth nothing in the consideration of this problem, it may fairly be expected that the revenues of these companies will be materially enhanced by reason of the increase of travel upon their lines brought about by the diminution of the fares.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my friend from Kansas will allow me, who is not replying to what I said about the impropriety of this sort of thing on appropriation bills, he imputed to me responsibility for what occurred in 1889, I think it was. I have got the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I find just what I had to do with it if he will pardon me for stating it in two minutes.

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It appears, Mr. President, on the 25th of January, or probably the 24th, as the top heading is "January 25, 1889," the District appropriation bill being pending, that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] offered an amendment which provided that street railway companies should change their rails to a grooved rail—I condense it in order to save time—and that if they did not do it the commissioners should do it, and that they should be sued to recover the amount of money that it cost to do it. Then I appeared upon the scene saying this, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] having asked to look at it:

While the Senator from Massachusetts is examining this amendment with a view to seeing whether an amendment he offered to it has or has not been adopted, I wish to say for my friend from Missouri [Mr. VEST], who is now absent, that he has asked me to look after this matter in his necessary absence, for him. He is of opinion, and I concur entirely, that the provision about collecting the cost of this change of rails and roadbeds had better be changed to the provisions of the act creating the present government of the District of Columbia.

Which is that they shall issue certificates of indebtedness and so on; and then I go on to say a better way still would be, if the District has to do it, Vermont fashion, to have the commissioners issue a warrant like a tax warrant and collect it out of the company in hand immediately, and afterwards only the question of how that thing should be done was what I had to do with at all, and not as undertaking to put anything on the appropriation bill, but if it were to go on it would be better to have the District tax-payers saved from going into a lawsuit, as we were then in already for three or four or five hundred thousand dollars for similar expenditures. Then later on, when the conference report came on, it containing the provisions of 1889 which finally passed as quoted by my friend, I referred to the fact that the committee of conference had probably put it in as good condition as it could be made on the appropriation bill.

Therefore my friend, I think, will do me the justice, in view of that record, to say that I had no lot or part in trying to pass legislation of this kind on that appropriation bill, but it being proposed I did my humble part in putting it into such a shape for my friend from Missouri, who was not present, as appeared to be wise.

Mr. PLUMB. I was not specially desirous of fixing any responsibility upon the Senator from Vermont in a matter of this kind, but when a matter of this sort which is of great importance is brought to the attention of the Senate in such a way that the responsibility must be apportioned, I do not mean that on so weak a back as mine shall rest any portion of the responsibility which belongs to another.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is right.

Mr. PLUMB. And what I said is absolutely and unqualifiedly established by the RECORD which the Senator has read. It is true that even that which he has said now was said as the proxy of the Senator from Missouri, and I suppose for the time being it absolved him from his obligation as the Senator from Vermont, and he was pro tempore the Senator from Missouri—

Mr. EDMUNDS. Put it that way if you like.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, if the Senator can escape responsibility while he sits in the Senate and sees the rules of the Senate violated, which he could stop by a single objection, and if he gives the currency of even an objection to it which does not go to the merits or to the parliamentary law involved, he knows how potent that is in the Senate and how persuasive it is upon all of us who are in the habit of following him, and when we find that he can sit here and see a thing of that kind go on without making any protest, the rest of us are only too glad to follow in his wake.

So, Mr. President, it appears that while the Senator from Missouri proposed the amendment the Senator from Vermont helped to lick it into shape, stood by while it was done, making no objection, although an objection from him, though parliamentarily worth no more than an objection from anybody else, would have persuaded everybody in the Senate that it ought never to have been proposed on an appropriation bill or elsewhere.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the Senator from Kansas whether he does not remember that the amendment I offered was indorsed as the right thing to be done by the Senator from Vermont, as shown by the RECORD.

Mr. PLUMB. I think it was.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly it was. The Senate was engaged in considering that proposition, and, the Senator from West Virginia having proposed a better way of stating it, I certainly said, as I always do when I think so—and I generally do when he proposes anything—that his statement was much better.

I am not willing to escape any part of my share of responsibility of this vicious sort of performance because I was present and I did not object, but I shall not do so any more [laughter]; and in order to save myself hereafter I now make the point of order that this second section of this conference report is entirely outside of the jurisdiction of the conference.

Mr. PLUMB. Well, Mr. President, as good people as the Senator from Vermont, according to the belief which we all of us have, have been saved by a death-bed repentance.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope you are not going to die just now. [Laughter.]

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Vermont is saving himself now by repenting. I find, Mr. President, going over this, that the Senator from Vermont made some remarks occupying about a column of the RECORD on that occasion, having special reference to the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia, and that Mr. EDMUNDS, the Senator from Vermont, after I had got through making a few remarks of about half a column in length—

Mr. EDMUNDS. On what page is that?

Mr. PLUMB. Page 1172.

The Senator from Vermont then engaged in a colloquy with whoever wanted to talk about the matter, extending over about a page and a half more of the RECORD on these same subjects.

My recollection was not so good when I first brought this up, because I did not remember half of what took place or half of what the Senator from Vermont had done after offering the amendment, but I was perfectly sure that the Senator consented to putting it in, notwithstanding the fact that one objection would have kept it out.

Mr. BLAIR. Would it be in order to suggest that this matter be postponed until the Day of Judgment? It will all come up there. It can not do any good here. [Laughter.]

Mr. PLUMB. I hope the Senator will not do that, because the Senator from Vermont has got his conscience quiet now by repenting. I want time to repent myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. We may not be in the same place.

Mr. BLAIR. I must acquiesce, of course.

Mr. PLUMB. I find that the Senator from Vermont not only took considerable part in this debate, as much as anybody else, but rather more, and his name appears oftener, and of course what he said is twice as good as what anybody else said; and when I asked him some question about what he said in this debate it covers every single phase of this amendment. He knew all about it as to terms, etc., and he certainly will not say he did not know it was an appropriation bill he was putting the amendment upon; and if I were on trial for my life on a matter of this kind I should plead that he misled me into the position I assume upon this proposition, for the fact is I was not in favor of it at any stage, although consenting to it.

I go as far as the Senator from Vermont, with a qualification which I will state in a moment, in regard to this practice of legislation upon appropriation bills.

There are some things, however, that it is practically impossible to provide for otherwise. They are trifling in importance, but they are in the nature of helps to administration. The Committee on Appropriations has had the benefit of the counsel of the Senator from Vermont in a number of things of a legislative kind, and I notice in this same bill of 1889 a provision on page 807 which he very kindly suggested to me and which was put on in conference, to this effect:

All sums of money heretofore appropriated by Congress or which may hereafter be appropriated and expended in aid of the purchase of real estate shall (subject to any trust deed, mortgage, or other security or incumbrance existing on such property at the time of its purchase, or created at the time of its purchase) be a lien upon such property, and in case of the dissolution of any such corporation as in the preceding paragraph is mentioned, owning such property, or in case of the disposal of such property by such corporation, entitle the United States to reimbursement in proportion to any other contributions or funds used in the purchase of such property.

A plain, unequivocal legislative provision which ought to have come from the District Committee and which ought to have been the subject of a separate statute, and it was the most natural thing in the world to put that provision in the bill in connection with these charities, for which we were being importuned, and where we naturally had some doubt as to the propriety of the appropriations which we were called upon to make for them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will pardon me I will, without repentance, take the responsibility of that clause. I have claimed—and I believe the Senator is right in my having suggested it to him, as he and I converse very freely about appropriations, as he knows—that it would be a wise and proper limitation upon the appropriations made by Congress that the money which Congress pays for real estate for charitable institutions should be a lien upon them, so that the property could not be sold and divided up among the incorporators, if such a base thing could be possible, and I thought and I think still that is a proper thing in an appropriation bill, for that is a limitation upon the expenditure of the money.

Mr. PLUMB. I think so too, but it is legislation all the same, and it only illustrates what I said a moment ago, that there are features of legislation which do not properly bear the characterization which the Senator from Vermont a moment ago gave to all of them alike. There are things which arise in administering these funds, which the Appropriations Committee must necessarily consider, which suggest from time to time such propositions as this; and I say with a great deal of pleasure—which I need not say, because everybody admits that any suggestion the Senator from Vermont makes has the greatest possible merit and is received with the greatest possible consideration by the committee—they are in the right line, and whether on appropriation bills or otherwise they are useful.

But the practice has become altogether too broad. I tried when the subject was before the Senate some years ago to have a limitation put upon the rule which was practical, and which would not be a constant invitation to the Appropriations Committee nor to the Senate to get into the broad legislative field, which we do occasionally enter upon in the consideration of what are practically supply bills.

If there could be some arrangement by which that which was purely incidental to appropriations or something which was even more formal could be brought to the attention of the Senate and only adopted by a yea-and-nay vote in such a way that no one should ever have the right to say that under an appropriation bill he had been misled or that under an appropriation bill nothing of that kind which was legislative had been surreptitiously introduced, great good might grow out of it.

But as it is we maintain the rule of absolute exclusion with exceptions which are bigger than the rule itself, almost, and that, I agree, ought to be stopped. I wished many a time, when a similar question was in conference in former sessions, that we had not taken up this railroad question at all, and I was so disgusted with the whole thing that, as I said before, I was at one time on the point of giving it up, but I consulted with the Senator from Iowa and other Senators who took an interest in the matter, and they thought as we went so far we ought to go further, and we did. That having been done, however, the original error having been committed, what followed was to some extent inevitable. At all events it happened, and happened just as I have stated.

As to the point of order which the Senator from Vermont has made, I can only say that so far as I am concerned I have never known anything about the rules of this body except that whatever the majority wanted was pretty certain to be done. I have never known any propcession which a majority of the Senate desired to have adopted, seriously and earnestly, but they would find some way of doing it, whether it was on an appropriation bill or by a separate provision or what not; and the Presiding Officer of this body, somewhat different, I may say, in that respect from the presiding officer of some other legislative bodies, is not the legislative body itself, but merely the organ; and when he is the organ of it, he is, according to common construction, the organ of the majority, and the office which he performs, therefore, is not vital in any sense to the legislative functions which are exercised by the Senate.

Mr. President, I do not myself believe that the result which the Senator from Ohio has spoken of will be injurious to the railroad companies, certainly not as injurious as has been stated. I believe that there is room for a very material reduction of the price of fare upon the street railroads of this city. Whether this is a wise thing to do or whether this goes too far I will not now undertake to say, although, according to my belief, the provision is all right.

But I want to say in regard to that matter, calling attention to what the Senator from Ohio said in his very frank statement in regard to it, that the first provision, which is merely an enlargement of the provision originally adopted in the Senate, is, in my judgment, now in a shape that will protect the public, while giving to the railroad companies the authority and the means necessary to carry out the provisions of the law of 1889, which are mandatory upon them and which, if they do not carry them out, are to be carried out by the commissioners of the District and charged upon them in the shape of a lien.

Mr. PLATT. Does the Senator think that this arbitrary reduction by law of fares in case the railroad companies shall make these improvements which we want them to make will operate to prevent the improvements, so that we shall not get them?

Mr. PLUMB. Upon that I have no information at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I insist on my point of order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order can not be raised upon the propriety of the matter inserted by a committee of conference. The Chair does not conceive that there is any question for the Presiding Officer to pass upon, whether the committee have or have not transcended their powers. It is a question for the Senate to determine, upon the report being presented, whether it shall be agreed to or whether it shall be rejected.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, my own impression is that the better way in that the Senate should enter a formal disagreement and refer the matter to the conference with the request that the fourth section be omitted. As far as I know, while the third section is very severe upon the companies, I have no desire to raise any question about that, but we can instruct our conferees to disagree to the fourth section, I believe it is.

Mr. PLUMB. As the Senate is not very full now and I understand some other Senators desire to say something upon this question, I will move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would state that a conference report must be agreed to or disagreed to as a whole.

Mr. PLUMB. But it can be accompanied with a request or with instructions to the conferees.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. After the action of the Senate. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, July 1, 1890, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 30, 1890.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

AMENDMENTS TO ELECTION LAW.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of parliamentary inquiry. Under the resolution by which House bill 11045 is being considered it is provided that during the last two days amendments may be offered to any part of the bill in the House with debate under the five-minute rule. I desire to know when that time will begin, as the Chair understands the order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks with the understanding by the House that it will begin at 3 o'clock to-day.

Mr. SPRINGER. I only wanted to have the matter determined in an authoritative way.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I send to the Clerk's desk the credentials of Hon. W. W. Dickerson, of Kentucky, elected to succeed Mr. CARLISLE from the Sixth district of that State, and ask that he be now sworn in. The credentials were read at length.

Mr. Dickerson then appeared before the bar of the House and was duly qualified, taking the oath of office prescribed by law.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. KENNEDY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 833) providing for the erection of a public building at Paris, Tex.;

A bill (H. R. 3940) to amend an act entitled "An act to extend the fees of certain officers over the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona;"

A bill (H. R. 4635) granting certain privileges to the Union Railway Company of Chattanooga, Tenn.;

A bill (H. R. 6946) providing for the sale of navy-yard and United States naval hospital lands in the city of Brooklyn, N. Y.;

A bill (H. R. 8342) for the removal of the United States court-house building at Baltimore, Md.;

A bill (H. R. 9289) to provide for a term of court at Danville, Ill.;

A bill (H. R. 8909) making appropriation for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 9856) making appropriation for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 166) authorizing J. B. Bernadou, United States Navy, to accept two vases presented to him by the Government of Japan.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. OWEN, of Indiana, for three days, on account of important business.

To Mr. SENEY, indefinitely.

To Mr. COGSWELL, for ten days on and after to-day, on account of important business.

FEDERAL ELECTION LAW.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. Speaker, if in order, I would like to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. I demand the regular order. We have but a brief time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is very glad to have the regular order demanded, but no gentleman seemed to exhibit any desire to speak, and the Chair recognized the gentleman from North Dakota.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think the desire to be heard on this bill will crop out as we proceed.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the further consideration of the special order.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I would like to say in advance that the minority of the committee have agreed that it will be impossible to extend the time of any gentleman who is going to address the House to-day, in consequence of the limited time at their disposal, and I hope, therefore, that no gentleman will take offense because objection may be made to an extension of time.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, there is one chapter in our political history so full of bitter memories that every American would gladly forget it forever if he could, the era of reconstruction.

But it must be opened now for the lessons it teaches. The passions of the war were then still burning and the people of the North were driven to approve of reconstruction by just such fierce declamation as the advocates of this bill indulge in. Under the reconstruction laws the negroes and their allies got possession of every one of the reconstructed States except Virginia and West Virginia. Let me give you some of the results.

In Alabama during six years the debt of the State was increased $17,148,000. During the same time millions were added to the debts of counties, cities, and towns.

In North Carolina, during three years, the State debt, including railroad indorsements, was increased by $23,800,000, the assessed valuation of taxable properties being only $120,000,000. Bonds to the extent of $14,000,000 were issued for railroads, not one mile of which was built.

Of the South Carolina debt I find myself unable to give the exact figures. But the debt soon got so large that it could not be managed and the carpet-baggers themselves repudiated it in part. Then they proposed to take a fresh start. But while there was "still left five years of good stealing in the State" they were turned out of power. And then they left the debt at over $6,000,000. Bonds to the amount of $6,000,000 were issued to two railroads, both of which roads passed into the hands of the carpet-baggers. The printing expenses of the State in one year, 1872, amounted to $450,000, which was $171,000 more than the State had paid for the same work in twenty-five years of the past. Fraud, force, corruption, and bribery prevailed to such an extent that the Republican governor, Chamberlain, found himself unable to leave even to attend a dinner of the New England Society, and said, in his letter declining the invitation, "The civilization of the Puritan and the Cavalier, the Roundhead and the Huguenot is in peril."

Georgia had only one Republican governor, Bullock. During his two years' administration the State debt was increased by $6,623,000, and bonds were indorsed amounting to $5,733,000.

In the little State of Florida $4,000,000 of bonds were issued that were subsequently declared unconstitutional; and in addition the increase of the State debt was nearly $1,000,000; and here, as everywhere else, taxation was oppressive, and every resulting dollar was spent or stolen.

In Tennessee the annual expenses of the State government were more than doubled and a bonded debt created of $16,565,546.60.

In Arkansas, during the six years from 1868 to 1874, the average annual expenses of the State government, exclusive of schools and public buildings, were $1,242,000. During the six years from 1880 to 1886, under Democratic rule, the same expenses of the State government averaged annually $278,000. Carpet-bag government cost more than four times as much as Democratic administration, and $5,350,000 of bonds were issued by the Republican State government to railroads. More than three times as many bonds were issued to each road as were allowed by the terms of the law. County debts were piled up in the same manner.

In Mississippi in six years the State debt ran up from practically nothing to several millions of dollars, and enormous sums, raised by State taxation, were all expended. In 1871 the tax rate was four times as much as under Democratic administration; in 1873, eight and a half times as much; in 1874, fourteen times as much. Sixty-four million acres of lands were forfeited for taxes—one-fifth of the lands of the State.

In Texas during four years of Republican rule the rate of taxation was three and a half times greater than it had been under Democratic administration. All the proceeds of this taxation were expended; the State that owed practically nothing at the beginning of this period was left with a debt of $4,414,095.45.

In Louisiana the State tax was found at three and one-quarter mills on the dollar. It was raised successively in 1869, 1870, 1871, and 1872, until it reached 2½ mills, where it remained for years.

Governor Warmoth found the State debt $3,700,000. January 1, 1872, it had risen to $48,029,349.95. Adding parish and municipal obligations, the debt of Louisiana in 1872 was $76,095,056.78.

The cost of public printing for the State during the first two and one-half years of Warmoth's administration was $1,140,881.70. In previous years the cost of the same printing was, for the same length of time, $92,500. The increase was over eleven-fold.

The assessed value of property in the city of New Orleans when Warmoth was inaugurated was $146,718,790. When Kellogg went out, eight years after Warmoth went in, the assessed value of the same property was $88,613,930. Real estate in the country parishes had shrunk in value from $99,266,839.85 to $47,141,696. City property had depreciated 40 per cent.; country property, 50 per cent.

The question is often asked why the Southern people, knowing the negro well and having so long exercised power over him when he was a slave, did not take control of the colored vote and use it for the purposes of good government. If Mr. Lincoln's plan had been carried out and suffrage had been left under the control of the States this would have been possible. Suffrage under Mr. Lincoln's plan would in time have come to the colored man from the States gradually and as he was fitted to exercise it. Then he would have been the friend of the white men who conferred upon him the right to vote. Then there would have been no race troubles, no color line in politics. The trouble comes from outside interference. The color line was a necessary result of the reconstruction laws and the manner of their enforcement.

As soon as these laws were passed Messrs. Wilson of the Senate and Kelley of the House went down to the State of Alabama to tell the negroes there that the Republican party had freed them, that the Republican party had given them the ballot, and that to the Republican party they all owed their allegiance. These and other eminent statesmen went to other States carrying the same message. And everywhere throughout the Southern States was the Freedmen's Bureau agent, looking forward to office for himself, poisoning the mind of the negro against the Southern white man, swearing him into the Union League, and teaching him there that he could only preserve the liberties the Republican party had given him by voting the Republican ticket. There was no chance then for the Southern man to divide the negro vote and there was no chance to lead it, for the negro trusted only the man that wore the blue.

Under these circumstances what was left for the white man to do but to unite. He was forced to forget the prejudices of the past and assert his natural superiority. In no other manner could he restore good government. He did so, and now the Republican party, on the claim that in certain small sections of the South there is a fraudulent counting of votes, proposes to seize for itself the power to do all the counting. That claim proceeds upon the idea that the Republican party alone can be trusted.

Sir, I challenge a comparison between Republican and Democratic election methods and results everywhere, and especially in the South.

The Republican governments in the South were not only born of the bayonet, but were, most of them, baptized in fraud; and they subsequently sustained themselves by the most flagitious election methods ever known in the history of republican government.

All the elections that inaugurated these governments were held under Republican auspices.

Alabama led off. The election for the ratification of her new constitution was in February, 1868. It continued for five days. Under the law of March 23, 1867, this constitution could only be ratified on two conditions: First, that a majority of all the registered vote should be cast; secondly, that a majority of this majority vote so cast should be for the constitution. At the same election officers were to be voted for to carry on the new government. The Republicans had put out a full ticket. The opposition offered no candidates. They thought to defeat the new constitution by registering and not voting, as they might do according to the law as it was written; and they did defeat it. General Meade, who held the election, reported that the constitution was beaten by 8,114 votes. This, of course, defeated all the Republican candidates; but Congress overrode the general in command, overrode its own law, and legislated into office, by one act, all the defeated candidates. Practically every office in the State, legislative, executive, and judicial, was thus stolen by a single act of Congress, passed by this party which is now so anxious for the purity of elections.

I venture to say that no gentleman on this floor not familiar with the facts can guess the ground the House committee here took in its report upon this Alabama election case. It is in print and speaks for itself. The Congress, after the Alabama election was over, had amended the law under which the election was held, and the House Committee on Reconstruction said that, though the amending law had not passed the Senate before the election, yet, as it had passed the House before that time, "your committee can see no reason why it," the new law, "should not govern in this case." And this was the ground that Congress took. In the preamble to the act admitting Alabama under this constitution and installing these defeated officials it was recited that the act of admission passed because the constitution had received a "majority of the votes cast." Congress did not dare to take issue with General Meade or to assume that the Alabama constitution had received "a majority of the votes of the registered voters," as was required by the law passed by that identical Congress at its first session.

Mr. Speaker, have we any reliable evidence that the Republican party in control of this Congress is any less anxious to control the country than were the Republicans of the Fortieth Congress? Is there anything in this treatment of the people of Alabama that should induce the people of the country at large to give this party full control over the count of votes in every district in the United States, with the Army to back up that count, and then to let them select every jurymen that is to try persons charged with election crimes? Is this Alabama case enough to satisfy us that we may safely entrust the power to count themselves into office to the Republican party?

Now let me give you some specimens of the election laws enacted by the States themselves that Congress had set up in the South.

In Alabama there was a heavy penalty imposed upon any one who challenged a vote, and an elector could vote anywhere in the county.

In South Carolina the law left it to commissioners of election to fix the places of election, and they could fix them at any time, even on the day of the election. These commissioners, by law, might keep the box ten days before declaring the result.

In Georgia no registration was required, and there was the fullest opportunity to repeat in a three-day election, no challenges being allowed. The governor appointed a majority of the managers at every box in the State, and often they were all of his party.

In Arkansas the governor appointed the board of registrars; this board appointed all clerks and judges of election, and the courts were forbidden by law to interfere.

In Louisiana the governor appointed the board of registration; this board appointed the supervisors, and the supervisors were not required to live in the parish where they served. Many of them went from New Orleans to serve as judges of election in parishes where they had never set foot before, and sometimes they returned themselves elected to office. The supervisors were liberally paid to make it an inducement for them to carry out the will of their master, and to further insure their conduct Governor Warmoth habitually required them, when appointed, to file with him their resignations, with blanks for dates. When a registrar failed to please him he could fill in the date and accept the resignation.

These laws and all these practices were all right then, for they were in the interest of the Republican party. There was no movement then for a national election law, and there would not have been till this day if these methods had continued to be successful. The Republican party was profiting then by these fraudulent laws and fraudulent methods.

The tax-payers of the South were humiliated and degraded; legislative bodies in the South, a majority of whose members were not tax-payers and many of whom could not read and write, were robbing States of their credit abroad while they plundered the citizen at home. In South Carolina alone there were two hundred trial justices who could not write; in other States there were justices and constables and even judges of commissioners' courts, courts that had full control of county finances, that could not write their names. But the net results were in favor of the Republican party. These were that in the Forty-first Congress, from March 5, 1871, to March 5, 1873, when the twelve Southern States, including West Virginia, had all been gathered in, these States were represented by twenty-two Republican and two Democratic Senators and by forty-eight Republican and thirteen Democratic Representatives.

You were satisfied, gentlemen, with this monstrous misrepresentation. Nearly all the property, intelligence, and capacity for self-government were on the side of the Democrats; and, divided by the color line, which you forced, we find that the combined majorities of the white population in these States in 1870 were 2,829,262. Now that these majorities have asserted their natural superiority by restoring honest governments to all these States and reversing the representation here, you seek to reconstruct us again.

This bill is to revitalize and solidify again the negro majorities that once dominated and plundered the Southern people; it is to put these colored people into line again under Republican officials and march them again to the polls with the Army behind them. But before I come to discuss the provisions of the bill, let me speak of what Democratic governments have accomplished in the South since the negro went out of power.

Under Republican rule in these States taxable values had everywhere gone down, while taxes and debts went up. Except into Texas, where an immense white majority insured good government, immigration had ceased, public credit was destroyed, and civilization itself was in peril. Under Democratic rule public credit has been everywhere restored. Peace reigns supreme where everything was turmoil and violence. Taxable values in the twelve reconstructed States, including West Virginia, increased from 1880 to 1889 by the sum of $1,112,315,000; and these twelve States, in agriculture, in mining, in manufactures, in railroad mileage, in railroad tonnage, in banking capital, and bank deposits, have increased by a percentage far greater than the other States of the Union combined. Figures already at hand show this, and the census now being taken will demonstrate it.

Northern and Western capital, that for a time was timid and held back, is pouring into every Southern State. From one to two hundred millions of dollars have already gone there for investment, and still it goes. There it finds natural resources unequalled elsewhere, and there it finds honest and stable governments. The lives, liberty, and property of all, white and black, are protected alike, and taxes are low. In the building of towns and cities the South is eclipsing the West. Public-school systems are everywhere improving. The money to support these schools comes mostly from the whites, who own most of the property, but it is expended for the education of whites and blacks alike. The negroes are enjoying more school facilities and accumulating more property than they ever did under the Republican governments they controlled. There is no large body of negroes anywhere in the world making such progress as the colored people now are in the South. And the governing classes are everywhere demanding, as the recent Democratic convention did in Alabama, greater appropriations for the public schools. The negro will soon be in condition, if these States are let alone, to take care of himself, as he ought to do, both as a taxpayer and a voter.

And these are the conditions with which you propose to interfere: By this bill you propose that the Federal Government, or rather that the Republican party, now in charge of the Federal Government, shall go into these States and, by its officials, array again the blacks against the whites, that it shall back them up with the Army of the United States and march them solidly to the polls. You know, gentlemen, full well that when the moneys appropriated by this bill get into these Southern districts the colored men will be told that it is all sent by the Republican party for their benefit; you know that when the Army arrives there they will be told that it was sent to see that they vote the Republican ticket, and when that shall be told to the colored men they will recognize the fact that it is the truth and nothing but the truth. If you gentlemen did not believe that the Republican party was to profit by this bill not one dollar would you vote to carry out its provisions, not one soldier would you send to the South.

Gentlemen, you are not even as consistent or as considerate as your predecessors were who passed the original reconstruction laws. Before they reconstructed the Southern States they reconstructed the District of Columbia. They thought it would be a shame to give the negro the right to vote away a Southern man's property and not give him at the same time the right to vote in the District at the Capital. So Mr. Henry Wilson says, in his history of reconstruction, that "both as a right and an example" they first enacted negro suffrage in the District of Columbia. Then they gave the District a Legislature and a governor, all to be elected by universal suffrage. But many Republican legislators had then, as they have now, property in this District, and they soon concluded that the example would not do; they soon concluded that the negro did not have an inalienable right to vote away their property in the District, and in 1874 a Republican Senate and a Republican House, without ever calling the yeas and nays, took away from the negro and the white man, too, the right to vote in the District of Columbia.

A Republican President approved the bill and for sixteen years not a ballot has been cast in this District.

Why do you not now, when you seem to be so anxious about the rights of the negro, first give back the right that Mr. Wilson said and your party said was his, the right to vote here around this Capitol?

Gentlemen, you know that this arraying of race against race in the South will tend again to bring about race conflicts. You must know that it will endanger again the peace and prosperity of the South, and you know that the frequent use of the military at the polls will tend to destroy free government. If you do not you are ignorant of the fundamental conditions of the problem with which you are dealing. If you do know this and nevertheless insist on the bill, then you are reckless of the consequences.

It is no answer to say that we have no carpet-baggers in the South now. Unprincipled and vicious men are confined to no State and no section of this Union. The North never sent forth a greater scoundrel than Swenson, of North Carolina, than Moses and Crews, of South Carolina, or than many others I could mention.

There are men in every State in the South now ready to put themselves at the head of negro majorities wherever you may muster them together by your supervisors and your Army; yes, ready to cater to their cupidity, to pander to their prejudices, and to lead them, as Moses and Crews did, in any scheme of plunder that may be devised. Is it kindness to the negro of the South to array him against the white man? Is it kindness to the white man, is it justice to the Northern man who has invested his property in that section? Is it in the interest of good government?

That frauds are sometimes committed in Congressional elections in the South no candid man can deny; neither can any honest man deny that frauds are often committed in the North. But I utterly deny that frauds there have been perpetrated to the extent or to anything like the extent claimed by the authors of this bill.

If frauds are committed there, this House has the remedy in its own hands. It is the judge of the elections and returns of its own members. Everybody knows, and knew, as soon as the elections of 1888 were over, that this House was to be Republican, and that a Republican House, after all that had been said in the canvass, would be ready and anxious to turn out every Southern Democrat who it could be made to appear was not fairly elected; there was an effort made to get up contests from the South, yet there were comparatively few contested cases from that region. The number does not begin to compare with what the public had been led to expect from the complaints that were made on the hustings. From those States of the South as to which most complaints are made you have tried six cases, and two of them have been decided in favor of Democrats by this Republican House. This House has turned out more Democrats from the State of West Virginia than from any other State in the Union, and there has been no complaint that the negro question made any figure in any of these cases.

No, Mr. Speaker, when the Republican governments died in the South they left us a fearful legacy of debt and bitter memories. It could not but be that now and then frauds would be resorted to for the prevention of what was deemed to be even worse than fraud. I am not here to deny that this was so. But the South is naturally as much in favor of fair elections as any other portion of our country, and if left to ourselves we will soon solve in the only rational and effectual manner the problems that are upon us. As we are educating our white people so we are educating the negro. We want him to know how to vote intelligently. We wish him to learn that it is not his interest to array himself solidly against the white man; that he is interested in legislation that shall be fair to all, just as the white man is who lives under the same laws and cultivates the same fields. It is a lesson the negro is learning and will learn thoroughly, if the national Republican party will only cease to interfere by outside legislation between the races.

Gentlemen, I beg you to pause and consider. Do not put upon your consciences all the evils that are to come from this bill, that is to perpetuate strife between your fellow-citizens of the South.

We want fair elections, but, sir, we know we can never have them under this bill.

Now let us look at it for a moment.

It proposes to repeal the present jury law, which provides that Democratic and Republican names alike shall be put into the jury-box. I had the honor of proposing that law. It was passed because marshals were packing juries whenever and wherever they desired. When it is repealed Republican officials can pack juries again. The possibility and even probability that this is to be done will encourage Republican election officials and intimidate Democrats. It gives to the Republican party complete supervision over registration of voters. It gives special supervisors the same power over naturalization that was exercised by Davenport in New York in 1873, when he had one Mosher swear out in packages three thousand warrants to terrorize and frighten voters from the polls, and it gives in cities just as many supervisors at $5 a day as the Republican chief supervisor and marshal may decide on to make a house-to-house canvass and report as to the occupation, naturalization, age, and of course on the politics, venality, etc., of the residents. A more ingenious scheme to aid the Republican party in carrying the Democratic cities of the North could not possibly be devised.

The bill gives power to appoint any number of deputy marshals, ten thousand and even more in one city, provided only the marshal and the supervisor shall in conferences agree on them. And here let me say I was glad to hear my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] say that Johnny Davenport wrote the bill, and I am willing to believe he did, for I do not like to attribute to the gentlemen from Massachusetts and Illinois [Mr. LODGE and Mr. ROWELL] the motives that must have actuated the real author of the bill when he penned certain sections of it.

I knew the gentleman from Illinois was not the author of it, for he did not know that it provided for an unlimited number of deputy marshals. I am satisfied the gentleman from Massachusetts did not know everything that was in it or he could not have used such honeyed words when discussing it. The truth is, time enough has not been given for anybody to understand it. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McCOMAS] made a long speech about it, or rather about the laws of Maryland, and showed that he had not read it carefully, for he said there was not a blue-coat in it.

It was rushed into a caucus before the Republicans had time to read it; it was pushed in here before Democrats had time to study it, almost before the minority could report upon it, and it is to be rushed through the House without sufficient time to debate it and without one minute's consideration in the Committee of the Whole. Under the bill the supervisor can employ five hundred deputy marshals and supervisors at $5 a day each for twelve days before an election in one city to make this house-to-house canvass. At whatever door they knock it must be opened unto them; the inquiries they can legally make are without number and they can use as bribes the moneys furnished as fees by the Government with absolute immunity. They have only to arrange with such Democrats as are willing for $5 per diem to go as deputy marshals into distant counties where they can not vote and thus keep them away from the polls. And while visiting officially they can electioneer for the party that pays them.

The executive officer of the system is to be a chief supervisor for every Congressional district. This chief supervisor is to put the machinery into play and manipulate it. He is to be chosen from the United States circuit court commissioners. There is no class of officials in the Government more complained of to-day and for years past by the accounting officers of the Treasury—Democratic and Republican, and by the Attorneys-General, Democratic and Republican—than these commissioners. The complaint now is that they surround themselves with spies and informers, harass the citizens that they may multiply fees and rob the Government. From this class the chief supervisors are to be taken, and the bill gives opportunities for making fees without limit. Whenever this officer receives a petition from 100 citizens he shall apply to the court and the court shall appoint three supervisors for each polling place in a district.

The words are mandatory on the court and on the chief supervisor. They must act when petition is made, and, as the pay is $5 per day, the petition will be made in every district. The court is to have no power to appoint except from the names handed in by the chief supervisor. He will hand in and the court is to appoint one Democratic and two Republican supervisors for each box. That he may have opportunity to select Republicans who will be active and Democrats who will be subservient, the law provides that the chief may receive applications for supervisorships at any time between one election and another. This will give ample scope for consultations between this chief and the applicants for trading and dickering. The bill seems to be an improvement even on the methods of Warmoth. It allows the chief to send his hirelings from any one portion of the district to another, just as Warmoth sent his registrars from New Orleans to hold elections in distant parishes. But Warmoth, in order to secure the subservience of his registrars, felt himself obliged to take from each, when appointed, a resignation with date in blank; and whenever the registrar failed to serve his interest the carpet-bag governor filled in the date of the resignation and accepted it. Then the pay stopped.

This law, however, saves all necessity of resorting to such devices. It gives on its face power to the chief supervisor to suspend at any time, whether engaged in registering voters or holding an election, and for reasons resting in his own breast, any supervisor whatever, and then the pay stops. Could control over election officers or over registration be more absolutely and completely vested in one man than by giving this power of instantly stopping pay? Certainly the carpet-bag governor of Louisiana did not think so, and I think this House will agree that he was an expert in devising fraudulent election machinery. It does not better the case to say that one supervisor at each poll is to be a Democrat. He may be called a Democrat, but he is not to be selected by a Democrat; he is to be such a Democrat as will suit the views of the Republican chief supervisor—that is to say, a Democrat who will vote the Republican ticket for the $5 a day he is to get. Mr. Speaker, this is not surmise, but actual fact, proven by experience with Republican officials in the South since the days of the carpet-bagger.

Only a few years ago there was a contest here for a seat in the House between my friend General WHEELER, the Democratic candidate, and

Mr. Lowe, who was an Independent, run by the Republicans. In that contest about twenty supervisors were examined who had been appointed nominally as Democrats and to represent the Democratic party. Every one of them swore he voted for Lowe. Could that have been accident? Impossible. It was design. Either these Democrats were all bought with the fees, or they were selected because in that election it was known they would not vote the Democratic ticket. So it will be under this bill if it becomes a law. Two zealous partisan Republicans, and one Democrat working for the money and working to suit his employer, may be sent off to hold an election in a county they never set foot in before. When they get there they are supreme, supported by two deputy marshals of the same ilk, and, if need be, by a section of the Army; and if they should be charged by the citizens of that county with any fraud of whatever nature no county court or State court can try them.

The bill provides in the most abundant manner for the removal of every possible case against them to the United States courts, where Republican officials can select the juries that are to try them. Whatever count is made by these supervisors or the majority of them, backed by their deputy marshals and United States soldiers, is to be, unless overruled by a court for errors on the face of the papers, final and conclusive, anything that may be said or done by State officers of election to the contrary notwithstanding. It was by a similar process to this that Louis Napoleon held the election, the plébiscite, at which the French Republic ceased to be and the President of France became Napoleon III, Emperor of the French.

When the supervisors at the boxes make their returns they are to be counted by a United States board of canvassers of the Congressional vote for each State.

This board is to be composed of two Republicans and one Democrat. This board is to give the certificate of election upon which the Clerk of the House is to put members upon the roll. If the Clerk of this House does not follow the Republican board of commissioners he is made guilty of felony. It may be, sir, that the complexion of the next House may depend upon the rejection of the returns from some one box in the State, say, of New York, by this board of canvassers, and that every court in that State and the governor of that State may declare that return to be legal and valid.

State authority will stand for naught. Representatives are to be counted in by the officials appointed under this bill, and when once the majority has been determined here by that process that majority will stand throughout that Congress, for I believe there has never been a certified majority here virtuous enough to turn itself out of power.

If this bill passes and if it shall prove effectual to preserve the hold of the Republican party on this Government, if the people do not rebuke it at the first election, what power will they ever have to reverse the policy of the Republican leaders? How shall they ever relieve themselves from unjust taxation, how protect themselves from oppressive legislation?

It is the great virtue of our system of separate State governments that each State makes its own returns. Divided, as we always are, into two great parties, neither of these parties is ever in possession of all the power over the final returns. Napoleon would not have found it so easy to have himself declared Emperor of France if there had been separate returns from independent states as he did when all the provinces were all subject to one central control from Paris. That is why Paris is France. Pass this bill, gentlemen, put all the election machinery of the United States and the Army to back it in control of the Republican party, and you may paraphrase that saying and declare that the national Republican executive committee is the Government of the United States.

It has often been said, Mr. Speaker, that the greatest danger to be apprehended in this country is from the decision of closely contested Presidential elections. You all remember the discontent arising from the seating of Hayes over Tilden. A majority, or, if any of you say not a majority, then you will all admit that a large portion, of the people of the United States believed they had been cheated in the count. That belief, whether well founded or not, arose from the fact that the returning boards of the three contested States, South Carolina, Florida, and Louisiana, were all in the hands of the Republican party and that it was these Republican boards that certified to the election of the Republican electors. The chairman of the national Republican executive committee did not announce the result for some three days after the election.

Even Mr. Hayes gave it up at one time. But messages flew thick and fast over the wires between New York and South Carolina, Florida and Louisiana. Then Mr. Chandler claimed the election of Hayes, and then "visiting statesmen" went in troops to the contested States. The result so arrived at did not and could not give satisfaction. And I tell you gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber that no closely-contested Congressional election in this country will ever give satisfaction if you put all the power over the returns everywhere in the hands of one party. The people love fair play, and that is not fair play. There are many unfair things done in politics and the people submit, because somewhere in our complex system there is a set-off or a compensatory advantage. The Republicans gerrymander Pennsylvania in a manner that is unfair. They gerrymander New York in a manner that is exceedingly unfair. But the Democrats gerrymander, when they get the power, Ohio and Indiana, and that is in some sense a set-off. So if members are returned unfairly from any State, the fair-minded voter reconciles himself by the thought that, after all, the return was made by the party that controls that State and has the power there, and the other party that has other States probably does the same in them. It may be that now and then one party improperly certifies more members than another. For the sake of argument admit that to be so, and admit, which I do not by any means, that now it is the Democratic party that has the advantage. If you convince the people of that fact they will in the other States more than make it up to you at the polls.

I believe that is the situation to-day. I believe you convinced the people at the North, who do not understand the situation, that we were committing frauds at the South by the wholesale, while you yourselves were entirely innocent, and that by this means you beat us in 1888. But if you pass this bill, if you violate the traditions of the past, if you break down State lines, if you take away power from the State boards that are in the hands of the two parties in almost equal numbers, and take all this power into the hands of the party that is in control here, with the Army to back them, you destroy all hope of fair play in the future, all confidence in the freedom of elections, which lies at the very base of the Government.

The boards of canvassers that are to do the counting are, under the bill, to meet on the 15th of November, or in certain cases a week later. Suppose that next fall the House is in doubt, and that twenty districts are close and doubtful. Long before the 15th of November your national committee will know the situation. In addition to the millions of Government money authorized by the bill, it will have spent hundreds of thousands of dollars raised from private subscription. Do you suppose that after the election its chairman, while the House is still in doubt, will sit still and spend no more money? To ask the question is to answer it. The wires would be hot again, as in 1876, and "visiting statesmen" would be on the road again, as in 1876. And then the laborer was worthy of his hire in 1876; why should he not be now? The members of the returning boards of 1876 nearly or quite all got offices; why should not those of 1890 also get their reward? Gentlemen, you are blind to suppose the people will sustain such a law as this. If they do, it seems to me that the end of free elections and of free government in America is not far away.

Another odious feature of this bill, Mr. Speaker, is that it is so devised as to draw within the jurisdiction of the United States supervisors the Presidential election also. You do not pretend to have any power over that. But by the laws of most of the States Presidential electors are voted for on the same tickets as members of Congress. By letting the State machinery stand you supervise the vote for President and the vote for Congressmen at one and the same time. Is that accidental or intentional?

I have not had time to say much about the use of the Army at the polls. Let me conclude what I have to say with one remark. Abraham Lincoln said, in December, 1863, writing to General Shepley about a forthcoming election in Louisiana, and that was in time of war, that to send members of Congress to Washington elected at the point of the bayonet would be disgraceful and outrageous. Is there not left in this House enough of the spirit of Abraham Lincoln to defeat a bill that expressly gives power to elect members, not only in the South, but in every district of the United States, at the point of the bayonet? Is not such a bill, in the language of Lincoln, "disgraceful and outrageous?"

APPENDIX.

WHY THE SOLID SOUTH? OR, RECONSTRUCTION AND ITS RESULTS.

RECONSTRUCTION AT WASHINGTON UNDER ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

The death of Abraham Lincoln was an appalling calamity, especially to the South. Had the crazy assassin withheld his hand reconstruction could never have been formulated as it was into the acts of March 2 and March 23, 1867.

Mr. Lincoln's leading thought in the conduct of the war was the preservation of the Government of the fathers; and he took issue squarely with those who, like Mr. Sumner, were seeking to take advantage of the times and "change this Government from its original form and make it a strong centralized power." (Nicolay and Hay's Lincoln.—Century, October, 1899.) He believed the Government to be, as Chief-Justice Chase afterwards defined it in Texas vs. White, "an indestructible union composed of indestructible States." Upon this idea of the Constitution he based his theory of restoration, a theory which, at the time of his death, was well known, though it appears to have since been indistinctly forgotten. This theory was, that the insurrectionary States, notwithstanding the war, still existed as States; that they were never out of the Union and were always subject to the Constitution. Hence it followed that those people of these several States who were entitled to vote by the laws existing at the date of the attempted acts of secession had, when they returned to their allegiance and were pardoned, the power of reconstruction in their own hands. On this theory President Lincoln aided the people to set up State governments in Tennessee, Louisiana, and Arkansas, all without any aid from Congress.

But from the beginning there were eminent Republicans in Congress who denied the authority of the President to "intermeddle," as they called it, in this business. As early as 1861, Mr. Stevens, of Pennsylvania, had announced the doctrine that the Constitution and laws were suspended where they could not be enforced; that those who had defied them could not invoke their protection, and that Congress could legislate for such rebellious territory outside of and without regard to the Constitution.

Mr. Sumner laid down the proposition, in resolutions introduced February 11, 1862, that, by attempting to secede, a State had committed suicide, and its soil had become territory subject to the supreme control of Congress. Both of these theories, which did not differ in result, denied to the President any power whatever in the premises.

But Mr. Lincoln seems always to have stood on the declaration made by Congress in July, 1861, that the war was being waged "to defend the Constitution and all laws in pursuance thereof, and to preserve the Union, with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired; that as soon as these objects were accomplished the war ought to cease," etc.

Pursuing steadily the spirit of these resolutions, even down to the day of his unhappy death, reconstruction as practiced by him was, simply, restoration of civil authority in the insurgent, but still existent, States, by the people thereof, aided by the military power of the United States.

More than two years after this question of power had begun to be mooted in Congress the President formulated and communicated to that body, in his message of December 8, 1863, the plan he proposed thereafter to follow. In no material particular did it differ from the theory upon which he had theretofore acted. He said: "Looking now to the present and future, and with reference to a resumption of the national authority within the States wherein that authority has been suspended, I have thought fit to issue a proclamation, a copy of which is herewith transmitted."

In the proclamation embracing the plan, he offers pardon to all who will swear "henceforth" to support the Constitution of the United States, etc., and proclaims that when those who, accepting this amnesty, shall have taken the oath of allegiance, each "being a qualified voter by the election laws of the State existing immediately before the so-called act of secession, and excluding all others, shall re-establish a State government, which shall be republican and in no wise contravening said oath, such shall be recognized as the true government of the State," etc.

This was President Lincoln's plan for restoring the insurgent States to the Union. It left the question of suffrage entirely in the hands of those who were qualified to vote under the laws existing at the date of secession. It was precisely this proposition, namely, that each insurgent State, at the time of rehabilitation, must decide for itself whether it would adopt negro suffrage, that angered the Republicans in Congress when acted on by Andrew Johnson, and culminated in the impeachment proceedings.

But Abraham Lincoln and Andrew Johnson were two different persons. Johnson was pugnacious—seeking always to beat down his adversary and never to conciliate. Lincoln, on the other hand, never needlessly antagonized those who could be won to his views, though he was accustomed to adhere to his matured opinions with inflexible purpose, as we shall see he did in this case, in the face of the fiercest opposition.

When this message of December, 1863, went in, many of the Republican leaders were claiming for Congress exclusive jurisdiction over the question of reconstruction under the clause of the Constitution which declares that "The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government." The counter-claim by the President, that he could aid the people to set up governments for themselves, seemed a challenge.

Congress debated the question at length, and finally, in July, 1864, passed, by a small majority in each House, a bill "to guaranty to certain States a republican form of government."

This bill did not meet the wishes of extremists, because it did not give the ballot to the negro; but, if it became law, it would be a step gained for the extremists. It asserted the jurisdiction of Congress and provided expressly that the President should recognize by proclamation the State governments established under it, only "after obtaining the consent of Congress." The President refused to approve the bill and defeated it by a "pocket veto." July 9 he made a public statement, giving reasons for his course. The bill, he said, was received by him only one hour before the adjournment of Congress, and, among other things, he thought that the system of restoration it provided was "one very proper for the loyal people of any State choosing to adopt it."

But he clearly was opposed to forcing it on any State by law, as he went on to say that he would at all times be "prepared to give the Executive aid and assistance to any such people," that is, people who should "choose to adopt it," etc. The Congressional plan, "when the insurrection should be suppressed," etc. Senator Wade and Representative Henry Winter Davis responded in an angry protest. To the admirers of Mr. Lincoln this document, dated in July, 1864, contains charges that are astounding. After stating that the signers had read the proclamation "without surprise, but not without indignation," the protest contends that want of time for examination was a false pretense. "Ignorance of its contents is out of the question," says the manifesto; and then argues that Mr. Lincoln was cognizant of a plan by which "the bill would be staved off in the Senate to a period too late in the session to require the President to veto it in order to defeat it, and that he," the President, "would retain the bill if necessary, and thereby defeat it."

The protest further says: "The President, by preventing this bill from becoming a law, holds the electoral votes of the rebel States at the dictation of his personal ambition," and complains that the will of Congress is to be "held for nought unless the loyal people of the rebel States choose to adopt it." It also calls Mr. Lincoln's action "a studied outrage on the legislative rights of the people."

Here the issue is squarely made whether the President was to restore or the Congress to reconstruct the insurgent States.

The President went on his way.

Long after his plan of restoration had been published to the world, his party, in convention assembled, had approved his "practical wisdom," "unselfish patriotism," and "unswerving fidelity to the Constitution," and now, in November, 1864, on this platform, Mr. Lincoln received 212 electoral votes to 21 for George B. McClellan.

On the 5th of December, 1864, the President sent in his last annual message, which was without any allusion to the question of reconstruction, unless it was in his mind when, speaking of the insurgents, he said: "They can at any moment have peace simply by laying down their arms and submitting to the national authority under the Constitution;" and its closing words possibly had reference to the same subject: "In stating a single condition of peace, I mean to say that the war will cease on the part of the Government whenever it shall have ceased on the part of those who began it."

It is very clear that up to this point Mr. Lincoln was determined never to become a party to any political war upon the Southern States waged for the purpose of compelling them to range under a political banner.

Congress, during the session that ended 1864-'65, either did not care or did not dare to insist on any reassertion of its right to reconstruct. On the contrary, seeing, as it undoubtedly did, that the Confederacy was about to collapse, it adjourned on the 4th of March, leaving Mr. Lincoln an open field for his policy of restoration. Every member of that Congress knew what that policy was. It meant the promptest possible restoration of civil authority in the States by the aid of Executive power. And so, now, shortly before his death, the President went on to prepare, or cause to be prepared, the proclamation for the restoration of North Carolina, which was issued by his successor, Andrew Johnson, May 29, 1865, and was the basis of all Mr. Johnson's subsequent work in that field.

Mr. McCulloch, Secretary of the Treasury during the last few weeks of Lincoln's and throughout the whole of Johnson's Administration, says, in his Men and Measures of Half a Century, page 378: "The very same instrument for restoring the national authority over North Carolina and placing her where she stood before her attempted secession, which had been approved by Mr. Lincoln, was by Mr. Stanton presented at the first Cabinet meeting which was held at the Executive Mansion after Mr. Lincoln's death, and, having been carefully considered at two or three meetings, was adopted as the reconstruction policy of the Administration."

On the 18th day of July, 1867, General Grant, before the reconstruction committee, said that according to his recollection "the very paper (the North Carolina proclamation) which I heard read twice while Mr. Lincoln was President was the one which was carried right through" by President Johnson.

In the face of these facts it is remarkable that intelligent public opinion should seem to have since settled down to the conclusion that the restoration policy of Andrew Johnson was a departure from that of Abraham Lincoln. Upon the all-important and controlling point that the people of each State were to settle for themselves the question of suffrage, this being a constitutional right they had not lost, the views of Lincoln and Johnson were identical.

It would seem that Mr. Blaine holds a different opinion. He says, in discussing the North Carolina proclamation as issued by Johnson, volume 2, page 77, Twenty Years in Congress:

"It was specially provided in the proclamation that in choosing delegates to any State convention no person shall be qualified as an elector or eligible as a member unless he shall have previously taken the prescribed oath of allegiance and unless he shall also possess the qualifications of a voter as defined under the constitution and laws of North Carolina as they existed on the 20th May, 1861, immediately prior to the so-called ordinance of secession. Mr. Lincoln had in mind, as was shown by his letter to Governor Hahn, of Louisiana, to try the experiment of negro suffrage, beginning with those who had served in the Union Army and who could read and write; but President Johnson's plan confined the suffrage to white men, by prescribing the same qualifications as required in North Carolina before the war."

Not only was this North Carolina proclamation approved by Mr. Lincoln; not only was it consistent with the theory he had so long maintained against such fierce opposition; not only did it leave the question of suffrage exactly where it was left by the message of December 8, 1863, but the very letter referred to by Mr. Blaine, to show a difference between the views of the two statesmen, conclusively proves, when quoted fully, that they both believed that, as was provided in the proclamation Mr. Blaine was discussing, suffrage was a matter for the States to regulate.

Mr. Lincoln's letter to Governor Hahn says: "Now you are about to have a convention which, among other things, will probably define the elective franchise. I barely suggest, for your private consideration, whether some of the colored people may not be let in, as, for instance, the very intelligent, and especially those who have fought gallantly in our ranks."

"But this is only a suggestion, not to the public, but to you alone."

Andrew Johnson made a similar suggestion when he wrote, August 15, 1865, to Governor Sharkey, of Mississippi: "If you could extend the elective franchise to all persons of color who can read the Constitution of the United States in English, and write their names, and to all persons of color who own real estate valued at not less than $250, and pay taxes thereon, you would completely disarm the adversary and set an example that other States will follow."

The difference was that Andrew Johnson did not say: "This is only a suggestion, not to the public, but to you alone."

The letter to Governor Hahn does show that Mr. Lincoln would have been glad to have the States, in regulating the suffrage, make certain exceptions in favor of the negro—exceptions that would not probably embrace 10 per cent. of the colored male adults in any Southern State, and could therefore have done no harm—but the letter also clearly shows that he thought it would be an unwarrantable interference with the rights of the State for the President of the United States to do more than make a private suggestion about the matter. That the writer of this letter would ever have consented to put negro suffrage upon the States by a law of Congress is inconceivable, unless there had come some radical change in his opinions; and this can not be shown.

If no better evidence can be adduced than this offered by Mr. Blaine to show a difference between the plans of two Presidents, and we have seen none, then we are authorized to conclude that the Presidential plan remained the same, from the time it was inaugurated by Mr. Lincoln, in 1862, down to the date when, in March, 1867, Congress concluded to destroy the State governments which the people, acting in accordance with that plan, had set up for themselves—some of them under Lincoln's and others under Johnson's supervision.

In discussing the motives which influenced Congress in refusing to recognize and in finally overthrowing these governments and demanding constitutional amendments, a great American law writer, Judge J. Clark Hare, himself a Republican in politics, in his recent work on American Constitutional Law, page 747, says: "When the South was prostrated by the rebellion the dominant party resolved on measures that would tend to keep them in power and might be necessary for the protection of the colored race."

The author, pursuing, as he declares in his preface, "jurisprudence with an eye single to truth," here affirms that the controlling motive of Congress in reconstructing the States and the Constitution was partisan, with as much confidence as if his statement were based on a decision of the Supreme Court.

ANDREW JOHNSON AND RESTORATION.

Congress adjourned March 4, 1865, not to convene again until the first Monday in December, unless called to meet in extra session.

Johnson was inaugurated President on the 14th of April, 1865, just as the Confederacy fell. As he intended to carry on the work of restoration upon the lines laid down by his great predecessor, he needed no aid from Congress; and so it seemed to be a happy contingency that it was not in session. In his Cabinet were Seward, McCulloch, Stanton, Welles, Dennison, Harlan, and Speed, the same strong men gathered around his council board by the late President, and all still in favor of the Lincoln plan of restoration.

The sudden collapse of the Confederacy was remarkable. Within forty days from the date when General Johnston gave up his sword there was not a single Confederate soldier in arms. The surrender was complete. Submission to the authority of the United States was everywhere absolute. Courts were established; the postal service rehabilitated; tax collectors and tax assessors went about their business.

On the 29th of May, President Johnson issued the proclamation that had been approved by President Lincoln for the restoration of civil government of North Carolina. William H. Holden was appointed provisional governor, with authority to call a convention to frame a constitution of government for the State. Proclamations, similar to that for North Carolina, followed for South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Florida and other States.

The people of the late Confederate States accepted with readiness the Presidential policy of reconstruction. In fact, the unanimity with which those who had waged such a desperate conflict against the Union now took again the oath of allegiance to the Constitution of the United States was a phenomenon that startled the Republican politicians; and it must have inspired distrust in the minds of many honest Northern voters.

But it was all in the utmost good faith; and it was not strange.

From the days when the agitation of the slavery question began to divide the country into two sections, the South always talked more about and cared more for the Constitution, which it looked to for the protection of its property rights in slaves, than did the North, which relied on its majority of voters to maintain whatever views of public policy it might happen to entertain. Thus it came about that the South was as devoted to the Constitution as was the North uncompromising for the Union. When, therefore, the Southern States had seceded, the Constitution of the United States became the Constitution of the Confederate States, with such changes only as would emphasize and make still clearer the reserved powers of the States.

It is simply history to say that the people of the Confederate States looked upon themselves during the late war as fighting to perpetuate the Constitution of their fathers. Slavery they deemed merely an incident. Secession they regarded simply as a method by which they could place themselves in position to forever maintain inviolate the Constitution of 1789. Nothing but the spirit of liberty, however mistaken it may have been, could have animated slaveholder and non-slaveholder to make side by side that terrible struggle of four years for the Confederacy, just as similar noble impulses animated the people of the Northern States to pour out so much of their blood and treasure for the Union.

When the Confederacy had died and independence was no longer possible, slavery, it was apparent, had gone down forever. Secession, too, was dead. These two obstacles removed, the pathway to progress in the Union seemed open, and Southern people were invited now by Johnson, as they had been by Lincoln, to come back and claim the protection of the Constitution under which they were born. They had never, in fact, lived under any other.

And now it is quite clear how the Southern people could and did attempt to resume their places in the Union with far greater unanimity than prevailed among them when attempting to go out.

Shortly after the assembling of Congress in December, 1865, the President was able to report that the people of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Tennessee had reorganized their State governments. The thirteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, abolishing slavery, had been adopted by twenty-seven States, the requisite three-fourths of the whole number, the reconstructed government of five of the seceding States having been counted as part of the twenty-seven.

The conventions of the seceding States had all repealed or declared null and void the ordinances of secession. Every office in North Carolina, South Carolina, Alabama, Georgia, and Louisiana, legislative, executive, and judicial, was filled either by an original Union man or by one who, having been pardoned, had taken the oath of allegiance to the United States.

The laws were in full operation. Senators and Representatives from most of these States were already in Washington asking to be seated in Congress, and the work of restoration, so far as it lay in the hands of the people of these States, was completed. The report to the President made by General Grant, December 18, 1865, was a fair statement of the condition at that time of public sentiment in the South. "I am satisfied the mass of thinking men in the South accept the present situation of affairs in good faith. The questions which have hitherto divided the sentiment of the people of the two sections, slavery and State rights, or the right of the State to secede from the Union, they regard as having been settled forever by the highest tribunal, that of arms, that man can resort to. I was pleased to learn from the leading men whom I met that they not only accepted the decision arrived at as final, but now the smoke of battle has cleared away and time has been given for reflection, that the decision has been a fortunate one for the whole country, they receiving like benefits from it with those who proposed them in the field and in the council."

But by the new State constitutions, which the Southern people had made for themselves, suffrage was confined to white men, just as it was in Connecticut, Ohio, Michigan, and other Northern States; and, too, the Senators and Representatives-elect now asking to represent these late Confederate States were mostly Democrats.

This was the situation when Congress convened in December, 1865. That body was largely Republican in both branches. Would this Republican Congress admit these Democratic States? If not, upon what ground would the refusal be based?

CONGRESS—1865-'66—POLITICS.

The first session of the Thirty-ninth Congress began December 4, 1865. The Speaker of the House of Representatives, Mr. Schuyler Colfax, upon accepting the office, said:

"The Thirty-eighth Congress closed its constitutional existence with the storm-cloud of war still hovering over us; and after nine months' absence, Congress resumes its legislative authority in these council halls, rejoicing that from shore to shore in our land there is peace."

The people of the Southern States had reconstructed their governments upon the idea that peace had come; but this very same House of Representatives, which now began with this declaration of its Speaker, that peace reigned supreme, was to make war upon the State governments of the South, justifying itself upon the theory that the war was not over. The Presidential plan was to be disregarded. Congress, in the language of Mr. Thad. Stevens, henceforth its accepted leader, was to "take no account of the aggregation of white-washed rebels who, without any legal authority, have assembled in the capitals of the late rebel States and simulated legislative bodies."

However completely this generation may have forgotten that Johnson's policy was Lincoln's, that Congress knew it well, for early in that session Mr. Sherman said in debate:

"When Mr. Johnson came into power he found the rebellion substantially subdued. What did he do? His first act was to retain in his confidence and in his councils every member of the Cabinet of Abraham Lincoln; and, so far as we know, every measure adopted by Andrew Johnson has had the approval and sanction of that Cabinet."

There can be but little doubt that if Mr. Lincoln had lived he would, during 1865, have progressed at least as rapidly with his plan of reconstruction as did President Johnson; he was always anxious to put an end to military control, and the successful ending of the war would have left him the most popular man this country has ever seen since Washington. Yet even Mr. Lincoln could not have avoided a struggle with Congress.

In December, 1865, Republican leaders felt that a crisis in the history of their party had come; and many of them were ready to go to any extreme. Mr. Stevens said on the floor of the House of Representatives that if the late Confederate States were admitted under the Presidential plan, without any changes in the basis of representation, these States, with the Democrats "that would be elected in the best of times at the North," would control the country; and he said, on the 14th December, 1865:

"According to my judgment, they (the insurrectionary States) ought never to be recognized as capable of acting in the Union or of being counted as valid States until the Constitution shall have been so amended as to make it what its makers intended, and so as to secure perpetual ascendancy to the party of the Union."

Mr. Stevens had two plans: first, to reduce the representation to which the late slave-holding States were entitled under the Constitution; secondly, to enfranchise blacks and disfranchise whites.

But the mind of the Northern voter was not yet ready for negro suffrage. Pennsylvania, Ohio, and other States still denied it. Connecticut, in 1865, gave a majority against it of 4,272. Even in October, 1867, Ohio gave a constitutional majority against colored suffrage of 50,629; and so late as November, 1867, Kansas was against negro suffrage by a majority of 8,998; while Minnesota adhered to the white basis by a majority of 1,298. It was perfectly clear that the people were not now, in the winter of 1865-'66, prepared to indorse the extreme measures that were being mooted at Washington.

"Mr. Stanton, near the close of his life, looking back over those exciting times, declared that 'If Mr. Lincoln had lived, he would have had a hard time with his party, as he would have been at odds with it on reconstruction.'—McCulloch, Men and Measures."

What Congress would do was an interesting problem. Mr. Thad. Stevens, however, seems never to have doubted how it would be solved. He predicted that public sentiment within less than two years would come up to his position. But to the accomplishment of such a result time and work were necessary. As a first step, on the 4th of December, 1865, the very day the Thirty-ninth Congress was organized, Mr. Stevens introduced and passed in the House, by a party vote of 133 to 33, under the previous question, without debate, a resolution to provide for a joint committee of fifteen to report on the condition of "the States which formed the so-called Confederate States of America." The Senate assented at once to the formation of the joint committee, and afterwards, on the 23d of February, 1866, finally agreed to a concurrent resolution, which had been the second proposition of Mr. Stevens's original resolution, that neither House should admit any member from the late insurrectionary States until the report of the joint committee on reconstruction, thereafter to be made, should be finally acted on.

Thus it was settled that the people most vitally interested in the two great problems, the basis of representation and the qualification of voters, were to have no part, in Congress, at least, in their solution. But more than that, here was time gained within which the effort could be made to bring the Northern mind up to Mr. Stevens's position.

The joint resolution refusing admittance to Southern Representatives and Senators was not passed without strenuous opposition. It was an open declaration of war upon the Presidential plan. Mr. Raymond, of New York, a distinguished Republican, made a great speech in defense of the President's policy. Mr. Shellabarger, of Ohio, to break the force of Mr. Raymond's argument, talked thus:

"They framed iniquity and universal murder into law. . . . Their pirates burned your unarmed commerce upon every sea. They carved the bones of your dead heroes into ornaments, and drank from goblets made out of their skulls. They poisoned your fountains, put mines under your soldiers' prisons; organized bands whose leaders were concealed in your homes; and commissions ordered the torch and yellow fever to be carried to your cities, and to your women and children. They planned one universal bonfire of the North from Lake Ontario to the Missouri," etc.

Hon. Henry Wilson, in his History of Reconstruction, quotes this and many other similar passionate appeals, intending them, of course, as fair specimens of the arguments which brought about the reconstruction of Federal and State constitutions.

Early in this session Congress sent to the President a civil-rights bill conferring many rights, not including suffrage, however, upon emancipated slaves. This Mr. Johnson vetoed on the ground that it was unconstitutional; and, according to decisions since made by the Supreme Court, it was. The veto of this bill greatly aggravated the quarrel, which was already open and bitter, between the President and Congress. It also lost Mr. Johnson the support of Messrs. Dennison, Harlan, and Speed, who resigned from the Cabinet. Mr. Stanton, too, became an avowed enemy of the President and his policy. But he did not resign. He was advised by Mr. Sumner and others to "stick;" and he remained in the Cabinet as an obstructionist. This was utterly without precedent, and serves well to illustrate the height to which party passion had risen. Another reason for the break in the Cabinet, in all probability, was that Southern Democrats very naturally were supporting President Johnson's policy. Senator Wilson's History of Reconstruction is full of eloquent invectives launched in the House and Senate at Andrew Johnson because he was supported by Democrats, "rebels," "copperheads," "traitors," "importers of poisoned clothing," etc.

The memorable words of Mr. Lincoln in his last annual message were: "The war will cease on the part of the Government whenever it shall have ceased on the part of those who began it." But Mr. Lincoln had passed away and his words had lost their power. Mr. Blaine, in his Twenty Years, even mentions it as a cause of offense that those who were in arms against the Government when Congress adjourned in March, 1865, were, some of them, at the hotels in Washington, demanding to be admitted to seats in the Congress which met in December. The inflammatory debates in the first session of the Thirty-ninth Congress were preliminary to the canvass for members of Congress to be elected in the autumn of 1866. No factor in those elections proved more potent than the rejection by Southern Legislatures of the pending fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. The clauses on which its acceptance or rejection turned in these assemblies were: section 2, which apportioned Representatives in Congress upon the basis of the voting population; and section 3, which provided that no person should hold office under the United States who, having taken an oath as a Federal or State officer to support the Constitution, had subsequently engaged in the war against the Union.

It was claimed by the friends of the amendment to be especially unfair that the South should have representation for its freedmen and not give them the ballot. The right, however, of a State to have representation for all its free inhabitants, whether voters or not, was secured by the Constitution, and that instrument even allowed three-fifths representation for slaves. New York, Ohio, and other States denied the ballot to free negroes, some States excluded by property qualifications and others by educational tests, yet all enjoyed representation for all their peoples.

The reply to this was that the Constitution ought to be amended because the South would now have, if negroes were denied the ballot, a larger proportion of non-voters than the North. Southern people were slow to see that this was good reason for change in the Constitution, especially as they believed they were already entitled to representation, and conceived that they ought to have a voice in proposing as well as in the ratification of amendments. Five of the restored States had already ratified the thirteenth amendment, and such ratification had been counted valid. If they were States, they were certainly entitled to representation. So they claimed.

It was perhaps imprudent for Southern people at that time to undertake to chop logic with their conquerors, or indeed to claim any rights at all, as the net results of their insistence were that they were called "impudent claimants" by the Republican convention at Pittsburgh, and indeed everywhere in the Republican press.

The insuperable objection, however, to the ratification of the fourteenth amendment was to be found in the clause which required the people of the late Confederate States to disfranchise their own leaders, to brand with dishonor those who had led them in peace and in war.

The rejection of this amendment at the South greatly strengthened the Republican position, because the North, looking at it from a different standpoint, thought the proposition a fair one. If any among those who proposed the amendment intended it should be rejected, it was awfully devised; if it was not intended to procure its own rejection, then it was clumsily contrived.

THE FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Even before the close of the war public sentiment had demanded some provision for the protection of the liberated slaves, who every where came flocking into the Union lines. The result was the establishment by law, March 3, 1865, of a Freedmen's Bureau, which was speedily extended, after hostilities had ceased, into all the late Confederate States. The law made the agents of this bureau guardians of freedmen, with power to make their contracts, settle their disputes with employers, and care for them generally. The position of bureau agent was one of power and responsibility, capable of being used beneficently, and sometimes no doubt it was; but these officials were subjected to great temptation.

Many people, who believed that the newly emancipated slave needed a guardian to take care of him, believed also that if he only had the ballot he could take care of himself and the country too. In fact the sentiment in favor of universal suffrage was already strong, even in the spring of 1865, and it was natural for every bureau agent who might have a turn for politics to conclude that, with the bureau's help, Mr. Stevens and his friends might eventually succeed in giving the negro the ballot. The bureau agent was "the next friend" of the negro. With negro suffrage this official's fortune was made. Without it, of course, this stranger had no hope of office in the South. It was not, therefore, to his interest, if he had political aspirations, that there should be peace between the races.

From conscientious men connected with this bureau General Grant obtained the information upon which he based the opinion, given to the President in the report already quoted from, that "the belief widely spread among the freedmen of the Southern States that the lands of their former owners will, at least in part, be divided among them, has come from the agents of this bureau. This belief is seriously interfering with the willingness of the freedmen to make contracts for the coming year." And he further said: "Many, perhaps the majority, of the agents of the Freedmen's Bureau advise the freedmen that by their own industry they must expect to live. . . . In some instances, I am sorry to say, the freedman's mind does not seem to be disabused of the idea that he has a right to live without care or provision for the future. The effect of the belief in the division of lands is idleness and accumulation in camps, towns, and cities."

The first lesson in the horn-book of liberty for the freedman obviously was, that in the sweat of his face he must earn his bread—a law unto all men since the days of Adam. It is a sad commentary on the workings of the bureau that the best thing General Grant could say of its agents was, that "many, and perhaps a majority of them," did so advise. If these officials were really responsible, as General Grant believed, for the demoralized labor condition at the South—and their power over the freedman is beyond all question—then they were, in fact, organizing chaos where their mission was peace and good order.

Nearly every one of these agents who remained South after reconstruction was a candidate for office; and many actually became governors, judges, legislators, Congressmen, postmasters, revenue officers, etc.

Such a situation as confronted Southern Legislatures in the fall and early winter of 1865 was never before witnessed in America. Prior to 1861 the laws to compel people to industrious habits were not generally so stringent in the South as in the North. This resulted partly from slavery and partly from the easy conditions of life in a mild climate. There were no laws that met the new situation. New and stringent statutes were passed to prevent vagrancy and idleness. There is not space here to discuss these laws. They will be treated of in a subsequent chapter and compared with statutes then in force in Northern States. Suffice it to say now, they did not merit the odium visited upon them by many honest Northern voters, who, not understanding the situation, were led to believe them nothing short of an effort to re-enslave the negro, when their purpose was simply to counteract the teachings that had demoralized the freedman and compel him to industrious habits.

THE COMMITTEE OF FIFTEEN.

The passage of the concurrent resolution in December, 1865, to inquire into the condition of the late Confederate States meant open hostility to the Presidential plan. Having declared war, the dominant party of course exercised great care in selecting members to serve on the committee which was to make this inquiry. Mr. Blaine (volume 2, page 127) says:

"It was foreseen that in an especial degree the fortunes of the Republican party would be in the keeping of the fifteen men who might be chosen." Speaker Colfax and the appointing power in the Senate put on the committee twelve Republicans and only three Democrats, one from the Senate and two from the House.

The field from which testimony was to be drawn was the unrepresented South. On the subcommittee which took testimony as to Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Arkansas, there was not a Democrat to call or to question a witness. The only hope of fair play lay in the magnanimity or sense of justice of men who had already voted to refuse admission to the Southern members and who were placed upon the committee with the expectation, as Mr. Blaine has indicated, that they would take care of the Republican party. There is not space here to discuss the evidence of the witnesses, who chose or were chosen to come before these gentlemen. It consists of hundreds of pages of speculative testimony, hearsay, etc.

The crimes committed, in the most peaceful times, within eighteen consecutive months, among a population of 8,000,000, would, if industriously arrayed, make a fearful record. To make that arraignment of the late Confederate States was the task to which this able committee addressed itself in 1866.

The situation in these States was peculiar. When the surviving soldiers returned from the field, around their desolated homes they found 4,000,000 of slaves suddenly manumitted. The returning soldiers were themselves more or less affected by that demoralization which is an unending consequence of protracted war. The negroes were demoralized by their newly found freedom. They turned, for the most part, a deaf ear to the advice of their old masters and listened with avidity to the tales that were bruited about, said to have come from the stranger friends who had freed them, to the effect that the lands of their rebel masters were to be confiscated and divided among them.

It is impossible that, under such circumstances, however earnestly all good citizens might strive for the general good, there should not have been friction between the races. Yet, notwithstanding the extraordinary and unprecedented conditions, there was, to General Grant, nothing, as his report already quoted shows, in the situation there in the fall of 1865 that was not creditable to the masses of the people. General Grant was not in politics. The gentlemen of the committee of fifteen were; and a few words as to the treatment of one State, as a sample, will suffice to show that the methods employed were such as to allow no rational expectation of reaching correct conclusions. As to the condition in Alabama only five persons who claimed to be citizens were examined. These were all Republican politicians. The testimony of each was bitterly partisan; under the government of the State as it then existed no one of these witnesses could hope for official preferment.

In his testimony each was striving for the overthrow of his existing State government and the setting up of some such institutions as followed under Congressional reconstruction. When this reconstruction had finally taken place, the first of these five witnesses became governor of his State; the second became a Senator in Congress; the third secured a life position in one of the Departments at Washington; the fourth became a circuit judge in Alabama, and the fifth a judge of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, all as Republicans. There was no Democrat in the subcommittee which examined these gentlemen to cross-examine them; and not a citizen of Alabama was called before that subcommittee to answer or explain their evidence. Of the report of this committee, based upon evidence taken by such methods, Mr. Blaine permits himself to say (Vol. II, p. 9): "That report is to be taken as an absolutely truthful picture of the Southern States at that time."

The first session of the Thirty-ninth Congress now came to a close. Besides the passage, over the President's objections, of a still more radical Freedmen's Bureau bill than that defeated by his first veto, it had accomplished little else than to drive most of the moderate Republicans into the ranks of the extremists. On adjournment members went into the canvass at home. The late Confederate States were held out of the Union, and their status was to be determined by elections at the North. The rejection of the fourteenth amendment, the report of the joint committee of fifteen, the testimony taken by that committee, the evidence furnished by agents of the Freedmen's Bureau, the vetoes and the alleged treachery to the Republican party of Andrew Johnson—these were the material of the canvass. Mr. Johnson had adhered rigidly to Abraham Lincoln's theory of restoration. That theory the Republicans now were assailing and Johnson was on trial as an apostate.

CONGRESS, 1866-'67.

The Republicans came back to the last session of the Thirty-ninth Congress, which began on the first Monday in December, 1866, exulting in a great victory. Never since the beginning of the Government had there been such a campaign during an "off year." Though no President was to be elected, four national conventions had been held; the air was filled with inflammatory speeches, and the dying embers of the passions engendered by the civil war were fanned into flames.

The result of the election was a majority, in the Fortieth Congress, of 31 for the Republicans in the Senate and 94 in the House. The Republicans were greatly elated. President Johnson, who was still ready with his vetoes, was the only obstacle in their path. It was proposed to remove him by impeachment. As put by Mr. Shuckers, himself a Republican, in his Life of C. J. Chase (page 547), the Republican leaders at this juncture "felt the vast importance of the Presidential patronage; many of them felt, too, that according to the maxim that to the victors belong the spoils the Republican party was rightfully entitled to the Federal patronage; and they determined to get possession of it. There was but one method and that was by impeachment and removal of the President."

On the 7th of January, 1867, Mr. Loan offered a resolution that, "for the purpose of securing the fruits of the victories gained," impeachment of the President was necessary. On the same day Mr. Kelso, also "for the purpose of securing the fruits of the victories gained," introduced impeachment resolutions. Then Mr. Ashley moved and carried resolutions for the appointment of a committee to inquire for grounds on which the President could be impeached. No proof was offered; the committee was to hunt for proof. The President's "bank account" was examined. His private conduct in Washington was carefully scrutinized. Men were employed to investigate his public and private character in Tennessee. But nothing was found to his discredit." (McCulloch, page 394.) Notwithstanding the futility of this effort, in one form or another the impeachment programme survived until the next winter, when President Johnson furnished an excuse in the removal of Mr. Stanton from the Secretaryship of War, and the impeachment proceedings were then pressed to a conclusion.

It is now well understood that no legal grounds for the impeachment existed; and even at that day, in the height of party passion, there were seven Republican Senators, the exact number necessary to save the President, who, in spite of party pressure, voted "not guilty" at the trial.

The excitement prevailing in the country at large at the time of the impeachment may be judged of by the following editorial paragraph from the Harrisburg (Pa.) State Guard: "Just as sure as we believe the blood of Abraham Lincoln is on the soul of Andrew Johnson, just so certain are we that he contemplates drenching the country once more in the blood of civil war."

The effort to impeach the President was not allowed to delay the programme of Congress. Universal suffrage having been decided on, obviously the first step was, in the language of Mr. Henry Wilson, in his History of Reconstruction (p. 267), "the extension of suffrage to the colored race in the District of Columbia, both as a right and an example." The bill to this effect was before the Senate. Mr. BUCKALEW, of Pennsylvania, presented thus the grounds upon which Democrats opposed it: "Our ancestors placed suffrage upon the broad common-sense principle that it should be lodged in and exercised by those who could use it most wisely and most safely and most efficiently to serve the ends for which Government was instituted," and "not upon any abstract or transcendental notion of human rights which ignored the existing facts of social life." And, he said: "I shall not vote to degrade suffrage. I shall not vote to pollute and corrupt the foundation of political power in this country, either in my own State or in any other." The debate took a wide range. It was understood that the late Confederate States were to share the fate of the District. One question was whether the right of suffrage should be confined to those who could read and write. Mr. Sumner stated his position thus: "Now to my mind nothing is clearer than the absolute necessity of suffrage for all colored persons in the disorganized States. It will not be enough if you give it to those who read and write; you will not, in this way, acquire the voting force which you need there for the protection of Unionists, whether white or black. You will not secure the new allies, who are essential to the national cause."

The bill granting suffrage passed without qualification. On January 7, 1867, the President returned it with his objections. Mr. SHERMAN, discussing the veto, said: "The President says this is not the place for this experiment. I say it is the place of all others, because, if the negroes here abuse the political power we give them, we can withdraw the privilege at any moment."

It is curious, glancing forward a few years, to see the result of this initial experiment. In 1871, while the Republicans were still in power in both Houses, a law was passed allowing the District of Columbia to elect its own Legislature and governor. The newly enfranchised voters, who were given the ballot "both as a right and as an example," had thus full opportunity to show their capacity. What was occurring at that time in the Southern States was always a matter of partisan dispute, but the noon-day sun was shining full upon the capital District, and the whole country saw that the political power conferred was being "abused." As Senator SUMNER had indicated it might be, it was, in 1874, promptly "withdrawn" by a law which took away, not only from the black man, but also from the white man, the right, which the latter had long enjoyed, of voting in the District of Columbia. The new law provided that the District should be governed by three commissioners appointed by the President. There has not been a ballot cast in the District since 1874.

Congress had the right to enact universal suffrage in the District of Columbia. It has exclusive jurisdiction there, under the Constitution; but that instrument might have been searched in vain, in 1867, for any power over the elective franchise in the States. Mr. Justice Nelson, of the Supreme Court of the United States, on the circuit had decided, in the case of Egan, that South Carolina was entitled, after her civil government had been restored under the Presidential plan, to all the rights of a State in the Union. In a carefully prepared opinion he said: "A new constitution had been formed, a governor and Legislature elected under it, and the State placed in the full enjoyment of all her constitutional rights and privileges." What was true of South Carolina was true of others of the late Confederate States, and if these States were States, as Mr. Justice Nelson held, then Congress had no power over suffrage within their borders.

But this view of the Constitution did not suit the majority in Congress. The victory at the polls in the fall had put them abreast with Mr. Stevens, and now, in the winter of 1866-'67, they claimed full power over the late insurrectionary States, on the ground that it was for Congress to decide when the war had ceased; and they decided it was not yet over. Mr. Fessenden put it thus: "Is there anything more certain than that the conqueror has a right, if he chooses, to change the form of government, that he has the right to punish?" etc. On the 15th of March, 1867, Senator HOWARD, of Michigan, said: "They took their own time to get out of the Union; let them take their own time to return. They took their own time to initiate the war; we took our time to close the war." Mr. Maynard, of Tennessee, seemed to think it necessary to show that the continued existence of the war was a fact, really existing, and not a fiction assumed for jurisdictional purposes, and he said, on the floor of the House, in February, 1867: "It is not quite accurate to say that we are at peace; that there is no war. What peace is it? The peace of Vesuvius at rest, the peace of the slumbering volcano; the fires banked up, not extinguished; the strength of the combatants exhausted, but their wrath not appeased; no longer able to continue the conflict, but awaiting a favorable opportunity to renew it."

The facts were that for eighteen months prior to Mr. Maynard's speech there had not been nor has there been during the nearly a quarter of a century since, any offer or thought, in any of the late Confederate States, of resistance to the General Government, unless one may denominate such the occasional shooting, by a moonshiner, of a revenue officer; and this has occurred, oftener than elsewhere, in the Republican district of East Tennessee, represented, the writer believes, by Mr. Maynard when he claimed to be standing on a volcano.

Nevertheless Congress solemnly adjudged, for itself, that the war was not over; and so, on the 2d of March, 1867, in order, as was recited in the preamble, "to protect life and property in the rebel States of Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, South Carolina, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Florida, Texas, and Arkansas," "until loyal and republican State governments can be legally established," it was enacted that those States should be divided into military districts and placed under military rule.

On the 23d of March, 1867, a supplemental act was passed completing the plan of reconstruction.* These acts annulled the State governments then in operation; enfranchised the negro; disfranchised all who participated in the war against the Union, whether pardoned or not, if they had previously held any executive, legislative, or judicial office under the State or General Government; provided for the calling of conventions, the framing and adopting of State constitutions, the election of State officers; and, in fact, pointed out all the machinery necessary to put into operation new governments upon the ruins of the old. Until the several States should be admitted under these new governments into the Union the military officers in command were to have absolute power over life, liberty, and property, with the sole exception that death sentences were subject to approval by the President.

Several ineffectual efforts were made to get the question of the validity of these laws before the Supreme Court of the United States. At last the case of McCardle from Mississippi seemed to present it fairly. McCardle, basing his denial of the power of a military court to punish him on the ground that the reconstruction laws conferring that authority were unconstitutional, appealed to the Supreme Court. That court denied a motion to dismiss the appeal. The case was then argued on its own merits. The argument was concluded on March 9, 1868, and the court took the case under advisement. While it was being so held, to prevent a decision of the question a bill was rushed through both Houses, and finally passed March 27, 1868, over the President's veto, depriving the court of jurisdiction over such appeals. This act, of course, implied the fear that the decision would be adverse to the validity of the laws, as a favorable decision would have been of immense value to the Republican party. Considering all the circumstances, it is indeed natural to conclude that this hasty action was based upon positive information that the decision, if made, would declare null and void the reconstruction laws.

After the passage of these laws and the muzzling of the Supreme Court, the careful observer of existing conditions, looking at the many adventures which he had followed in the wake of the Army, at the numerous employes of the Freedmen's Bureau, so long in training for their now fast ripening opportunities, might easily have predicted that the legislation of Congress would inevitably result in what Mr. Lincoln had feared and deplored as far back as 1862.

Just before the election for members of Congress, which had been ordered by Governor Shepley in Louisiana, President Lincoln addressed him a letter, November 21, 1862, saying that only "respectable citizens of Louisiana," voted for by "other respectable citizens," were wanted as Representatives in Washington. "To send," he says "a parcel of Northern men here, elected, as would be understood, and perhaps justly so, at the point of the bayonet, would be disgraceful and outrageous."

But party spirit had now gotten far away from that lofty plane on which Lincoln, the statesman, had stood.

Even Mr. Garfield, usually generous and conservative, had become so much excited as to say, in the discussion of these measures on the 18th February, 1867, and seemingly with exultation: "This bill sets out by laying its hands on the rebel governments and taking the very breath of life out of them; in the next place it puts the bayonet at the breast of every rebel in the South; in the next place it leaves in the hands of Congress utterly and absolutely the work of reconstruction." In other words, Mr. Garfield meant that if the results were not satisfactory, Congress might, at will, modify or change its plans.

But happily, as it no doubt appeared, there was only need for a few more changes in the law.

The reconstructors builded even better than they knew. The results exceeded even the sanguine prediction of Mr. Henry Wilson, who said, March 15, 1867, on the floor of the Senate: "With the exercise of practical judgment, with good organization, scattering the great truth and the facts before the people, a majority of these States will, within a twelvemonth, send here Senators and Representatives who think as we think, speak as we speak, and vote as we vote, and will give their electoral votes for whoever we nominate for President in 1868."

In a little more than a "twelvemonth" from the date of Mr. Wilson's prediction—by the close of June, 1868—eight of the eleven Confederate States were represented in both branches of Congress. Of these Representatives all but two were Republican and among the sixteen Senators there was not a single Democrat.

About one-half of these Senators and Representatives were Northern men, elected when, as Mr. Garfield said, "the bayonet was at the breast of every rebel in the South"—a thing Mr. Lincoln had characterized as "disgraceful and outrageous."

The "fruits of the war" were being gathered.

Nothing remained but to perpetuate existing conditions.

Not only did these newly set up States rally with alacrity the fourteenth amendment, but by the 30th of March, 1870, with their assistance, the fifteenth amendment was also declared part of the Constitution. Suffrage had been granted to the negro in the Southern States by Congress. This amendment provided that "the right to vote should not be abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude."

The net results of these reconstruction measures were, that in the Forty-first Congress, beginning March 5, 1871, when the twelve Southern States, including West Virginia, had all been gathered into the fold, they were represented by 22 Republican and 2 Democratic Senators and 48 Republican and 13 Democratic Representatives.

The national Republican party had, in the language of Mr. Sumner, secured the "new allies" it needed in the South.

What these new allies accomplished in the several Southern States will appear in the subsequent chapters of this book.

Mr. HOUK. Mr. Speaker, nothing short of what I conceive to be a duty under the circumstances would impel me to attempt to speak this morning because of my physical indisposition, a sore throat. My advocacy of a national election law does not grow out of any real or supposed emergency of recent origin.

Notwithstanding there may be and are a variety of reasons now existing in different parts of the country why this power should be asserted, it has been my conviction from my earliest reading of the Constitution and study of our form of government that it was a paradox, inconsistent with the symmetry and harmony of the National Government, to leave to the States the control of elections for national officers.

I presume that no man who is not utterly reckless will deny the power of Congress to enact all laws which it may deem necessary for the Government and control of the elections of members of its own body. But I desire to say further in this connection that a national election law can in no way possibly affect or promote my political fortunes.

In my Congressional district we have absolutely fair elections. I will say for the credit of the Democrats of my section of country I do not believe they want dishonest elections. A false count and fraudulent certificate, stuffing a ballot-box in the Second Congressional district of Tennessee would consign the perpetrators to the gloomy walls of the penitentiary and cast their sympathizers in the crime into the outer darkness of social and political disgrace. [Applause]. Therefore, my position on this subject grows out of my conviction, first, of the right and duty of Congress to control the election of members of its own body; and, secondly, as I will discuss a little further on, the necessity for the exercise of the power in reference to certain parts of this country.

To those listening to this debate, a stranger in the gallery would have supposed that the pending proposition was something to authorize the arrest and imprisonment, if not the hanging, of the entire Democratic party. It has been constantly iterated and reiterated from the beginning of the debate that this bill was intended to oppress and to impose upon, to do some great wrong to the people of the South. In the name of all the gods at once what harm will it do to have an honest election? Have you practiced dishonest elections so long that it will break your hearts if you have to have to stop it? [Laughter.]

That is the argument. And the other day our eloquent young friend from New Jersey [Mr. McADOO] was indeed eloquent in discussing the subject of "liberty." Well, now, "liberty" is a grand subject. But did you ever think about what a grand privilege it was to stuff a ballot-box, to make a fraudulent return, to send a man here with a certificate of the governor against whom three-fourths of the legal voters of his district had cast their ballots? This is a new phase of liberty. [Applause.] And yet we hear an appeal in the name of "liberty" for the right to stuff a ballot-box and make fraudulent returns. Our friend from New York [Mr. COVERT] made an eloquent appeal the other day, but while I was listening to him in his perversion of that grand sentiment made immortal by Abraham Lincoln, that this was "a Government of the people, by the people, and for the people," I could but think of the almost criminal prostitution of that grand sentiment in the interest of Government by fraud, by false returns, for the benefit of those who are dishonest enough to practice the frauds and make false and fraudulent returns, and be the recipients of such criminal conduct.

While there may have been somewhere, here and there, at some time, an occasional election fraud perpetrated by Republicans, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred from the days of the despotism of the democracy of Greece down to the present time when political rights have been invaded or subverted it has been in the interest of so-called Democracy.

It is to prevent fraud and secure honest elections, North as well as South, and not to wrong anybody that this law is proposed. Neither I nor any other advocate of this measure, so far as I know and believe, is actuated by any feeling of hostility to the people of the South.

Why should I dislike the Southern people? Adopting the language of the day, am I not one of them? Or am I and my section to be excluded from the use of the term "Southern?" Does it take a peculiar belief and the assumption or assertion of Bourbonism to make a man Southern? Born in the South, reared in the South, having lived all my life in the South, and fully expecting to die and be buried in the South, it is natural that all my personal affections and affinities are and should be with the people of the South.

Instead of oppressing, or degrading, or humiliating, or in anywise injuring the people of the South, it is my ambition to aid and elevate them in every way possible. Hatred has no place in my composition. Malice is an attribute I despise. Revenge is an abominable spirit. If I had it in my power I would embrace, lift up, and better all humanity. In advocating and voting for this bill I feel that I am placing my hands under and my arms around the people of the South and aiding to lift them to a higher plane of nationality and American citizenship.

But I am for this bill on the high and broad ground of constitutional right and political justice. Is it not a paradox to deny to the United States the right to protect its own sovereignty in the election of members of its own Congress?

Is this a nation? I affirm that it is and plant myself upon the explicit utterances of the Constitution. By that instrument every element of national sovereignty is vested in the Congress. I can not understand how any intelligent citizen can read the Constitution of 1789 and study it as a whole without coming to the conclusion that whatever differences of opinion there may have been originally amongst its framers, they nevertheless concluded their labors by investing the Government of the United States with all the attributes, elements, and powers of national sovereignty.

Through the provisions of the Constitution its framers clothed the machinery of the Government of the United States with all the powers then supposed to be necessary to enforce the sovereign will of all the people of all the States in their general and collective character of "We, the people of the United States." Turn to the eighth section of Article I of the Constitution, and it will be seen that Congress is invested and fully clothed with authority to exercise all the powers of sovereignty thought to be necessary to the existence of a great nation. Let me read. Here is what the Constitution says:

Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; to borrow money on the credit of the United States; to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes; to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States; to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and to fix the standard of weights and measures; to provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States; to establish post-offices and post-roads; to promote the progress of science and useful arts by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries; to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court; to define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and offenses against the law of nations; to declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and to make rules concerning captures on land and water; to raise and support armies; * * * to provide and maintain a navy; to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces; to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and repel invasion; to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States; * * * to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof.

What a grand national structure is here built by the express declarations of the Constitution? What a grand edifice of human freedom, a depository of "Liberty regulated by law!" And every necessary power vested by the Constitution in the national Legislature, every power incident to a great Government and the good of its people.

"Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts, and to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States," which, in the meaning of Americans and their use of language, is to look after the manifold interests and well-being of all the people of the United States. This is a sweeping and complete investiture of supreme sovereignty over, and the power to take care of, the people.

Every word and every articulation of this clause emphasizes the supreme sovereignty of the nation over all these necessary incidents of government through the exercise of Congressional power, subject to the co-operation of the executive, and in proper cases the judicial, department of our triune form of Government. Language could not have been found to more forcibly and fittingly express the national character of the "more perfect union" which was formed by the Constitution of 1789.

"To regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States" is such a clear and strong declaration of supreme sovereignty in the nation that I call attention to it here in order to enforce what I may say touching all these clauses of the eighth section of Article I of the Constitution, which I have quoted or may quote. Let us balance our minds on the clause "To regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States," and look critically through the Constitution and see if every element of supreme power does not inhere to the very structure of the Union.

It is clothed with power over the question of naturalization and citizenship; of commerce; of currency; of all these things which are essential to political existence. The nation, through Congress, must make provision for social and intellectual enjoyments by establishing post-offices and post-roads, as well as commercial advantages.

It must protect authors in their writings and inventors in their discoveries. It must establish courts, and through them enforce the laws necessary to the enjoyment of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. It has power to raise armies and support them out of the substance of the people. It shall maintain a navy, and provide even for calling forth the militia of the States, and for their equipment, discipline, and government while executing the laws of the Union. Congress shall provide for the doing of all these things for the protection and benefit of the people of the United States.

And last of all, though by no means the least, nor yet the greatest, the National Legislature is charged with making "all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution" all of these sovereign powers granted by express enumeration and explicit implication of the Constitution.

Now take in conjunction the fourth section of Article I of the Constitution of the United States and it clearly appears that Congress is vested with a supreme authority over and right to control Congressional elections.

Would it not be a remarkable paradox to find that the Constitution vested the power in Congress to organize armies, declare war, provide a navy, coin money, and do all the great and important sovereign acts enumerated in section 8, to which attention has been called, and then to abdicate the right to look after and see that Congress itself was not "packed" by fraud? The Constitution, as we have seen, clothes Congress with full power over the life of the nation, and yet we are told that the States must select members of Congress to suit themselves.

The absurdity of this position was illustrated in the secession movement. And if the States have the right and power to elect members of Congress in whatever way and manner they alone may determine, then any one or more of the States may break up the Government at any time it may suit their own purpose to do so and thus assert their supreme sovereignty to the overthrow and destruction of the rights of the people of the whole Union. This would be a clear, full, and conclusive vindication of the right of secession.

Just here let me pause for a moment and refer to the remarkable speech of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VAUX], the successor of the late distinguished member of this body [Mr. Randall]. In listening to his speech I was reminded of some old doggerel, which reads:

He didn't, nor he couldn't, nor he wouldn't.

If I understood him his argument was that Congress had no power to pass this bill because it had other provisions than those which, he argued, were strictly applicable to the time, place, and manner of holding Congressional elections.

The fact seems to have escaped his mind that the fourth section of Article I of the Constitution vested in and reserved to Congress all the powers which that section commanded the States to exercise in reference to the election of members of Congress. And he seems not to have recognized the fact that the States had no power over this subject except that which is expressed in the command upon them by this eighth section of the Constitution.

The phraseology of this section may be said to be peculiar. It will be noticed by a careful reading and study of the language that it, in fact, confers no power whatever upon the States.

It is simply the voice of the supreme sovereign, commanding the State as a subordinate part of itself to do a certain thing until such time as it should assume to do that thing for itself. So, to argue against the power of Congress, not only to prescribe the time, place, and manner of electing its own members, but to make all other regulations and details necessary to a thorough supervision of the conduct of these elections, is to deny the same right and power to the States, because, without the command contained in the eighth section of Article I, the States would have no right to legislate upon or take any control of these elections.

The language of this section is:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations except as to the places of choosing Senators.

Nothing is plainer than that this section of the Constitution simply commanded the States to provide for and control Congressional elections until such time as Congress should determine to take charge of and prescribe these regulations for itself.

But the real reason for the Democratic opposition to the exercise of this constitutional power of Congress over the election of its own members grows out of the Democratic doctrine of State rights and the determined purpose of that party to deny the right of the United States to exercise any act of national sovereignty. That party denies the national character of the Government. The Democrats look upon the United States as an "emasculated idealism." But I insist the right and power over this question are vested in and to be exercised or not by Congress as it may itself decide.

When our population was small, our country sparsely settled; when long distances divided the people; when it consisted of a few families, occupying distant plantations, as it were, it may have been well enough to yield to the dictates of convenience and permit the States to provide for and conduct Congressional elections, however inconsistent and paradoxical it may now appear in the light of our present surroundings. But circumstances and conditions have changed. We are now a great nation and a great and multitudinous people. We are great in numbers, great in wealth, great in genius, and great in intellectual development. We are great in all that adorns the highest civilization.

All Americans are neighbors; we are now one great family bound together by common interests and common ties and all citizens of a common Government, and all must be legislated for by the Congress of the United States in which the whole and not a part of the people must control.

It therefore logically follows as a matter of right that Congress should take hold of and control the election of the members of its own body. But if there was no other reason why Congress should take control of its own elections the utterances put forth in this debate ought to inspire every member of this body with a determination to immediately enact this measure into law.

But now what is it? What is this measure? Is it to do any wrong to anybody? Is it to lay a violent hand upon any citizen of this country? Is it anything new in the law? Not a word of it? It is simply a proposition to amend an old law which has stood upon the statute-book since the 28th of February, 1871; a law which has been declared constitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States; a law which has been commended by such distinguished Democrats as W. C. Whitney, S. S. Cox, and others; a law the constitutionality of which has been affirmed by a Democratic House of Representatives under the leadership of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, my friend Mr. SPRINGER.

The only new feature appearing in this proposed statute—the only thing that could be affirmed as a new departure—is the question of certification by the chief supervisor, which, under certain conditions, is superior to the certificate of the State authorities; and yet if I had any doubt about its constitutionality before, I would have no doubt about its constitutionality now, after my distinguished friend has affirmed it. In the Forty-fifth Congress, in the case of Dean against Field, a Democratic House of Representatives, under the law laid down by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], not only stood by and enforced the supervision law, but seated a man over the certificate of the governor of the State of Massachusetts on the certificate of the supervisor appointed under this law, and I have been listening to hear him come to the defense of this feature of the law. While he went a little outside of the law as it then stood in order to seat a Democrat, this bill proposes to make that ruling the law hereafter.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman allow me—

Mr. HOUK. I have not time to be interrupted.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am coming to it.

Mr. HOUK. Oh, I know that. I wish I had time. I would love to spend a quarter of an hour exchanging views with the gentleman; but I will state to him that I will give him the benefit of what he said then, that he may meditate upon it and remember it.

Here was a case in which the governor certified Mr. Field. The supervisor appointed under the law which is proposed to be amended certified that the Democrat was elected, and by a narrow majority of 5 votes only. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] in making the report rises to the dignity and height of the occasion and gives an elucidation of the constitutional power of Congress over this question and asserts that State rights must go to the rear and the national authority must stand. It is a good report, and I commend it to my Democratic brethren, for I want them to get right in the matter of supervisors and their certificates. I call on our Democratic friends to stand by us in sustaining their leader [Mr. SPRINGER] by voting for and passing this bill into law, so that in the future there will be no need of a forced construction by him in order to seat a Democrat.

In his report he said:

Congress, in pursuance of its constitutional power to make regulations as to the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Representatives in Congress, or to alter State regulations on the subject, enacted the foregoing provisions.

The same provisions that this bill contains, with the exception of the power of the supervisors to certify.

Then he says:

They must be held valid and binding upon the State. The very moment of the enactment of these provisions, February 28, 1871, they became a part of the election law of the State of Massachusetts, overriding all opposing statutes made or to be made by the State, and the passage of the State law of April 29, 1876, authorizing an aldermanic count, so far as it provided for the taking of the final vote for Representatives in Congress out of the supervision and scrutiny of the United States supervisors of election, was an invasion, if not a nullification, of the United States law.

That is pretty good, radical, "centralizing," Republican doctrine indorsed by a Democratic House. [Laughter.] I hope my friend stands by it, and I expect to see him, when the roll is called, come up like a man and vote "ay."

Mr. BOATNER. That will be on the motion to indefinitely postpone. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOUK. Yes; you want to postpone the day of judgment, of course. [Laughter.]

Here is more of the language of this report:

After Congress had provided for the appointment of two supervisors of election for each voting-place and had required such supervisors to count the votes for Representatives in Congress, and to remain with the ballot-boxes until the count was wholly completed and the certificates made, it is not competent for any State to provide another board of canvassers who may take possession of the ballot-boxes, exclude the Federal supervisors, and secretly count the votes and declare different results.

Is not that the identical thing that this bill is intended to provide for, to protect the ballot-boxes and prevent all outside interference, to prevent the votes being counted in secret and a fraudulent result returned?

Mr. SPRINGER. That is just what was done in Massachusetts and what was condemned by my report.

Mr. HOUK. I thank thee, Jew, for teaching me that word, but what was sauce for Massachusetts ought to be sauce for the Democratic States. [Applause.]

Mr. SPRINGER. But Massachusetts had violated the law by taking the count away from the proper officers.

Mr. HOUK. I knew that reading from this report of his would hurt the gentleman, and if I had time I could make it hurt him a great deal worse. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I stand by it.

Mr. HOUK. Then vote according to its doctrine.

Mr. SPRINGER. Every Republican on your side voted to disregard that Federal law.

Mr. HOUK. And therefore you indorse its violation by your Democratic friends. Now, Mr. Speaker, who has the floor? [Laughter.] I am not in the habit of interrupting gentlemen when they have the floor. I never did it in my life without their consent. I think it is a great impropriety, and I hope the gentleman will take the hint and will not interrupt me any more. [Laughter.] My time is limited, and the gentleman ought not to usurp it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. HOUK. Pardon is granted, but quit sinning. But I tell you the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has furnished a vast amount of good reading. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Read it all.

Mr. HOUK. I wish I had the time. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have read to the House from the report of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] laying down the law not only as strong as it then was, but as strong as we propose to make it. This bill simply proposes to enact Mr. SPRINGER's report into law on the subject of certifying elections. [Laughter.] And in defending his report, which the gentleman did elegantly, ably, magnificently, he said:

I ask the people of Massachusetts to make their laws conform to the Federal laws.

Now, Mr. Speaker, all we ask is for the several States to make their laws on this subject conform to the Federal laws, just as the gentleman from Illinois in the Forty-fifth Congress wanted Massachusetts to do. He proceeds:

I ask the Representatives of Massachusetts upon this floor to so vote in this case as to require the law of Massachusetts to conform to the laws of the land.

He meant the supervisors' law. Now, that was good doctrine. I approve every word of it. [Laughter.] We only propose by this bill to compel the authorities of every State to conform to the law of the land, and in that we have the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] standing by us and furnishing us the ablest argument that I have found on the subject. [Laughter.] Again he says:

Will it be contended that after the Federal supervisors have scrutinized one election and one State count it is competent for the State to set aside its own election and count where the Federal officers were present, and then go off into some secret hiding place under the pretext of—

under the pretext of State rights! and hold another election and make another count in disregard of the Federal law?

Again he says:

The Constitution of the United States provides that all laws passed by Congress under the Constitution are the supreme law, supreme in Louisiana, supreme in Massachusetts, supreme everywhere throughout the broad extent of this land.

Mr. Speaker, this is just what we want. That is all we ask. That is all we propose. Again, the gentleman says:

I say in regard to the election of members of Congress that is the Federal law, but it applies only to the election of members of Congress.

That is all we ask. That is all we apply this law to which we have under consideration. It is applicable only to Congressional elections. He says again:

The Congress of the United States have provided that United States supervisors shall be present at all times and all places for the registration, voting, and counting, canvassing, and making the returns of the election, and a State law which makes provision for recounting the ballots in disregard of the Federal law is not in accordance with the law of the land, and is, therefore, void.

Mr. Speaker, all this bill proposes is that the supervisor shall be present, that he shall see the count, that he shall observe, that he shall do what the Forty-fifth Congress did in the case of Dean vs. Field: that is, that he shall, in certain cases, make a certificate, and that certificate shall import verity prima facie, and shall place the man on the roll, just as the Democratic members of the Forty-fifth Congress placed Mr. Dean on the roll of this House over Mr. Field, on the authority of the certificate of the supervisor.

But why oppose the passage of this law if you want or are willing to have honest elections? Will not the United States courts prove as honest and capable in making appointments as the political machines? Will not the machinery put in motion by the courts be in the hands of men as worthy, as capable, as honest as those who have heretofore or who might be hereafter appointed by political officers, and will not those charged with the execution of this law be selected from among and of the same people from whom elective officers are now selected?

Is there some magic virtue in the selection of election officers by the States or in the selection of these officers by the political power of the States?

Is there some magic evil in the selection of these election officers by the United States or the non-partisan judicial officers of the United States?

How is this? Are the States and their people possessed of some kind of sanctified purity when acting under the authority of political officers of the States which is immediately corroded and lost when the same people are appointed by judicial officers and act under the authority of the United States?

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], in his great speech opening this debate, drew the line and clearly showed the difference in the honesty and purity of elections when conducted under national supervision and when held exclusively under and controlled by the laws and officers of the State.

But, Mr. Speaker, we are told that the passage of this bill, which thus stands commended before this House and the country by the able report and able speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], is for the purpose of reviving race prejudice and bringing about conflicts in the communities where it is enforced.

Now, I undertake to say, Mr. Speaker, that there is no race prejudice in the South involved in this bill. It is not race prejudice, and every gentleman from any Democratic State of the South knows it is not; it is not race prejudice at all which they are combating. It is a political prejudice; not that the colored man is black, but because he votes the Republican ticket. Why do I say this? Did not the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] the other day clearly demonstrate and proclaim to the world that it was not race prejudice, but political prejudice, when he stood in his place and declared that every decent white man in the State of South Carolina is a Democrat, thus presenting the key to this question?

The prejudice is not against the colored man because he is colored, but because he votes the Republican ticket. Every man on this floor knows that the colored man who votes the Democratic ticket has no trouble. If it is race prejudice, why does it not assert itself when the colored man votes the Democratic ticket? You know it does not. If it is race prejudice, why is it that every white man who enters the Republican party in the South is more bitterly assailed; more malignantly hated than the colored man?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Is that true?

Mr. HOUK. It is true in certain sections and of a certain element; it is not true in my own part of the country, because there is enough leaven of Republicanism in East Tennessee to leaven the whole lump and make the people law-abiding, orderly, and patriotic. But read your newspapers and you will see at a glance that they hate Mahone, Longstreet, and Chalmers, and Slaughter, and Mosby, and all others who join the Republican party. All the prejudice and malignity is evinced towards these distinguished white men that is ever evinced towards any colored man. This is the case the very moment a white man announces his adhesion to the policy and principles of the Republican party. It is prejudice upon public issues, not prejudice upon color or race.

But we are told that we can not enforce this law. Possibly we can not in some places; possibly in certain localities such a point has been reached in the disobedience of the law that no law in contravention of the peculiar views held by the people of those localities can be enforced. But would it not be cowardly to refuse to do our duty because criminals might resist the enforcement of the law? But I say to you that in the great majority of the localities where these evils exist there is an undercurrent of feeling among the white people as well as among the black.

There are Democrats—nominally such because of their surroundings—who are looking and longing and waiting for an opportunity to be given them in the shape of such a law as this around which they may rally and throw off those influences that have settled upon them like a nightmare and which constantly tend to the prostitution of their rights. There are thousands of white people, even in the black belts of the South, fairly disgusted and anxious to see law and order restored.

But it has been said (and of course I can only glance at these matters) that the enforcement of this bill will cost $10,000,000. I do not believe it; but suppose it costs three times $10,000,000. Did it not cost more than $6,000,000,000 to vindicate the rights of the people and have them written in the Constitution of the country? And if it costs $100,000,000 to assert those rights in practical political life in all parts of this country it will be money well expended and cheaply laid out.

But what is the condition of things in the South? Why the necessity for this measure? The election contests before this House have been referred to this morning. Not because there was not enough proof to disgust and make heart-sick any honest man that reads it, but because it was not gotten up in legal form, some of the contestees have kept their seats. But what do these records show—sworn testimony piled up mountain high from reputable people of every class, condition, and color? Why, sir, one of their methods is to copy the tax list and vote it. The record stands there in the room of the Committee on Elections showing where the tax list was copied.

There was a certain number of legal votes polled, for instance, but when the legal voters gave out they got the tax-list of the county and copied it; and so unskillfully was it done that they actually copied it alphabetically. Yet we are told that a law to correct such evils is going to oppress the people of the South.

But in other places there are other methods, methods which appear in my own State in certain localities. In large Republican precincts—and there is no doubt about it, every man who knows anything knows it is the truth—they deliberately let everybody vote; then the State officers, who are surrounded by the sacred crest, holy and pure, as we are told, of State authority, deliberately sit down and count the Republican votes for the Democratic candidate and the Democratic votes for the Republican candidate, thus making up and certifying the majority to the Democratic candidates. To show the Mississippi plan I will give in an appendix the votes of fourteen counties having white majorities and fourteen counties having colored majorities. This bill, if passed, will throw the shield of protection around the people where such practices prevail, will correct them, and will enable Congress and the people of the country to know the real result of the votes cast at the ballot-boxes when Congressmen are to be elected.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is said this bill proposes a strong Government. Yes; and it takes a strong Government to deal with the people we are trying to deal with and provide a remedy for their frauds. I want this Government to be so strong that it can reach out and lay its hand upon and punish every offender against the rights of the nation and the people. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Fourteen counties having 14,245 white majority gave Cleveland 9,799 majority. Sixty-two per cent. of the colored voters voted. Sixty-three per cent. of the whites voted. Only 12 per cent. of the colored voters voted; 90 per cent. of the white voters voted.

Mr. COLEMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am a Republican from conviction and from principle; a Southern man by birth, education, and association; elected as a Republican to represent in this nation's House of Representatives the Congressional district where I was born and raised. A realization of my oath of office and my responsibilities as a member of this Fifty-first Congress impress me now with much concern for those whom I am here to represent.

I am opposed to the enactment of any Federal election law at this time, for, notwithstanding the fact that the promoters of this Federal election bill aim to secure in the South that great desideratum, "a free ballot and a fair count," I do not think this a proper time to make this political experiment.

Mr. Speaker, I fully realize the importance of preserving the sanctity of the ballot, and I would heartily support a Federal election bill now if I thought its enactment would secure this important result; but I tell you that the supposition or opinion that the passage of any Federal election bill at this time will secure a free ballot and a fair count throughout the South is based on false impressions and ignorance of the true state of affairs in some parts of that section.

War is terrible in its immediate results, and the locality which was the field of operations of our unfortunate civil war suffered from desolation and destruction so as to require many years of peace to restore prosperity again. Following our civil war came the more disastrous period of reconstruction, which saddled upon our then desolated land debts and incumbrances which have not been fully paid to this day. Nothing but the soothing influence of time can veil that awful past and shut out those dreadful memories. If you think the South has not yet suffered enough from the war and its results, then start afresh the echoes of those dreary years of reconstruction. Roll back into the past the present march of progress and industrial development. Confine your Republican party in Louisiana and some other parts of the South to the few white men who may feed at the Federal crib of patronage, and the unfortunate colored people who, loyal to the memory of their emancipator, Abraham Lincoln, vote with the party which elected that noble benefactor of their race President of this nation. But, Mr. Speaker, when you stir up again the memories of reconstruction in the South bear well in mind that you are not following the advice of that national leader of men, that successful Republican, that wonderful man, powerful in brain, in frame, and in heart—Abraham Lincoln—for he said:

Let us strive on to finish the work we are in, to bind up the nation's wounds, to care for him who shall have borne the battle, and for his widow and his orphans, to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and a lasting peace among ourselves and with all nations.

Will you refuse to follow the teaching of this martyr statesman, who was your leader until his death—that most unfortunate calamity for the Southern people?

Of the 9,000 votes cast for me in November, 1888, 7,500 were those of colored men. And while many of these colored men were told that I was an ex-Confederate soldier and an ex-White Leaguer, they only asked to know that I was the regular Republican nominee. Now, with this confidence reposed in me, I feel it my duty to oppose with my voice and vote any legislation calculated to produce friction, trouble, or distress between the races.

Mr. Speaker, whenever you hear of trouble in the South between the races you will find that far more colored people are killed or wounded than there are whites who suffer, and any man or party who produces trouble between the races is not in sympathy with the best interest of either race. The colored people of to-day are far advanced in education, in intelligence, and in financial wealth beyond what they were twenty years ago. There are in Louisiana educated colored physicians, lawyers, ministers, editors, professors, and merchants. You can find there accomplished colored musicians and artists, and upon investigation you will find that the colored people have made such progress as astonishes those who had not given the matter careful consideration. Now, as a friend of these people I do not wish to stimulate any trouble between them and their fellow-citizens, and I am just as certain that trouble and bloodshed will follow the enactment of this bill, and that the law will fail in its purpose, as I am that I shall vote against its passage in this House.

Mr. Speaker, I deem it eminently proper and appropriate at this time to call the attention of this House, and particularly the Republican members thereof, to the fact that the only sitting colored member of this House at present, Mr. CHEATHAM, a Republican from North Carolina, introduced two bills on the 19th of last December (over six months ago) which are of special interest and importance to the colored people of this country, namely, No. 632, to reimburse depositors in the Freedman's Savings Bank and Trust Company, and No. 634, to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools. Both of these bills are quietly sleeping—"under the new rules"—notwithstanding the fact that this Administration with its Republican majorities in the House and Senate and Republican President could have enacted both bills into law several months ago. Gentlemen, why do not you show your sympathy for the colored people in a practical manner when you have such a favorable opportunity?

I want peace, progress, and prosperity. I want to see continue and increase the industrial development in the South, that wonderful industrial development started by the emancipation proclamation of Abraham Lincoln. I quote from the Baltimore Manufacturers' Record:

THE PROGRESS OF THE SOUTH.

We give in this number of the Record nine columns of two to four line announcements of a week's progress in Southern development. These items represent millions of dollars' investment in Southern industries and thousands of good new citizens for the South, who are warmly welcomed and given the right hand of fellowship. Industrial cities are springing up amid coal, iron, marble, granite, and around water-powers, that have been heretofore uninhabited. Southward the course of empire takes its way, and well it may, for here is the fairest land for all agricultural and rural pursuits, the most genial climate, the brightest skies, the widest virgin forests, the richest mines of coal and all metals, inexhaustible deposits of marble, granite, limestone, and sandstone, rarely beautiful rivers, immense water-powers, and the most hospitable people in the world.

Mr. Speaker, the amount of industrial development now going on in the South surprises those who have given this matter attention, and if you ask those men from the North, East, and West who have invested their money in the South, most of whom are Republicans, what they think of the Federal election law, you will find that 90 per cent. of them prefer peace; and every furnace and every rolling-mill and every factory established in the South makes friends and recruits for the Republican party of protection, internal improvements, and the enforcement of the law.

Mr. Speaker, I want to see the political solidity of the South dissolved. I want this Republican Administration to prove by its acts that the Republican party is a better friend to the South than the Democratic party has been or ever will be. I want to have proven that the success of the Republican party means internal improvement, education of the masses, progress, peace, and prosperity, instead of meaning what the Democrats say, "negro supremacy."

A Federal election law now will prove to be a very expensive political blunder, and the nation's money can be used to much better advantage by paying the many just war claims due to the loyal people of the South; paying the French spoliation claims, acknowledged years ago to be just; paying the balance due depositors in the Freedman's Savings-Bank; paying for the education of children, white and black, and paying for building and maintaining and protecting a system of levees to confine the waters of the Mississippi River to its channel, improving navigation while protecting from overflow that wonderfully fertile Mississippi Valley.

A Republican Administration spending Government money for such purposes would prosper the nation more and secure for years to come more Republican Congressmen and Republican Senators from the South than could be done by passing and attempting to enforce any Federal election law that can be suggested. If you are determined to pass a Federal election law, then you must prepare to enforce it with Federal bayonets and possibly Federal bullets, as suggested by the eloquent and distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], my big-hearted, generous, but impulsive friend, whose enthusiasm, when discussing this bill last Saturday, can be equaled only by his musical voice, his talent for song, and his wonderful good humor when participating in the rousing choruses of rebel war songs during that delightful Congressional vacation some weeks ago in the grandly picturesque and exhilarating surroundings of the Blue Mountain House.

With a condition of affairs suggestive of Republican Federal bullets fired from ranks of colored men and Federal soldiers, how many recruits will the Republican party secure from the ranks of their present political opponents?

Mr. Speaker, the principal influence which holds the white people of the South together is the old Democratic war-whoop of "negro supremacy" and "Africanization." Remove from the eyes of the people the scales of ignorance and of prejudice to the Republican party, and let them realize that the bugaboo "yawps" and war-whoops of the Democratic politicians are without foundation, then the shotgun squad will disband, and the negro will be protected in his political and civil rights by Republican ex-Confederates, ex-White Leaguers, and ex-Democrats.

In several if not all those States where bulldozing, intimidation, or ballot-box stuffing prevails we find feuds and divisions among the leaders of the Democratic party, and there are undoubted signs of disintegration, owing in many cases to the personal ambition of rivals for political position or patronage.

We find movements operating under the name of Wheels, Alliance, and Labor party, whose leaders and adherents have been voting with the Democrats. Pass a Federal election law, and many who are now willing to separate from the Democratic party will immediately get back into the so-called "white man's party" rather than risk "negro supremacy."

Years ago, in the days of Whig and Democratic parties, these two parties were so evenly divided that the best and strongest men of both sides were required for candidates in Louisiana. The southern part of Louisiana was Whig in politics and carried a large Whig majority up to the line of Red River. Now, as a matter of fact, when these old Whigs in the South vote the Democratic ticket they do so with more or less compunction, and they would be glad to vote against their old political opponents if they could do so without fear of negro supremacy. The color line is all the stock in trade the Democratic party has South, and now this Republican House proposes to strengthen this Democratic "stock in trade," to re-enforce the ranks of the enemy by passing a Federal election law, which, while failing in the object aimed at, will solidify the white people so rigidly against the Republican party South that social ostracism, personal persecution, malignity, and hate will be intensified. Gentlemen, do you insist upon participating in the enactment of a law which will produce such an unfortunate state of affairs?

Would you not rather welcome on this Republican side of this Hall Republican Representatives elected from districts which heretofore have been represented by Democrats, but who, having changed their politics, send Republicans here because they have discovered the falsity of the charge that the success of the Republican party meant "negro supremacy," and they discover that the Republican party is really the party of internal improvement, a strong central government, industrial development, and having plenty of room in that party for the ex-Confederate soldiers and all others who are interested in the maintenance and enforcement of the law?

The enactment of a Federal election law is sectional legislation, and the political party responsible for such can not expect to prosper thereby.

While it may be difficult to prove, I am of the opinion that votes are purchased and voters are influenced by employers in some other States than those in Dixie. Are you sure it makes no difference whose ox is gored?

Mr. Speaker, in reading General Washington's Farewell Address, delivered nearly one hundred years ago, I find the following passage, which seems to be very appropriate now:

One of the expedients of party to acquire influence within particular districts is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You can not shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heartburnings which spring from these misrepresentations, and they tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection.

Mr. Speaker, can it be possible that some districts that now send Republicans to Congress need to be stimulated by some political slogan which affects other sections, slogans which are plausible in theory but hollow in realization. Mr. Speaker, I have no sympathy for ballot-box stuffers, and I sincerely hope that the day is near when political bulldozers and intimidators, together with ballot-box stuffers, will be promptly and severely punished for such crimes. I believe that elections in some parts of some States are farces.

I realize the importance of maintaining the purity of the ballot, but I do not think that you will reach the result aimed at or remove the trouble by the enactment of a Federal election law at this time. But open the ranks of the Republican party and encourage recruits to come in; recruits who have handled a rifle and understand its mechanism and its persuasive influence. When recruits come in who pass through the peculiar ordeal of Southern Republican probation, with its trials and tribulations and they vote for Republican Congressional candidates, accept them as earnest workers and reward them for their services as they deserve, and do not insist that their Republican political record shall extend into "ancient history."

In distributing patronage shake off the old reconstruction barnacles, and do not treat Louisiana as a colony and a conquered province by appointing men to fill Federal positions who were outside of the State during election day. Reliable political leaders should be selected who work for other results than securing the election of delegates to national nominating conventions when they do not expect to deliver any electoral votes. The wheels of progress do not reverse. Emancipation and reconstruction are of the past. The election of a Republican member of Congress from Louisiana unassisted financially or otherwise by the national Republican committee was a surprise, particularly when it became known that the successful candidate had surrendered with Lee's Army of Northern Virginia.

Mr. Speaker, the South and North will always remain the same, geographically speaking.

But old ideas and sectional traditions are passing away into the memories of long ago. The rich blood of martyrs to their faith, soldiers in blue and in gray, which flowed so freely on that Southern soil when cruel war scarred much of that fair land, should surely bring some blest results in token of that precious blood. Then why can not the comrades and the children of those dead heroes enjoy the blessing of the fruitful peace which fills that land with such prosperity?

Now when the springtime comes and flowers begin to bloom and nature decks the Southland, hill and dale, the women of the South, with hearts so full of sentiment and love, pay tender tribute to the brave dead, and soldiers' graves are strewn with flowers of varied tint and fragrance, and if perchance the violets and blue bells fall on Southern soldiers' graves, the heliotrope and mignonette may decorate the graves of those who wore the blue. The colors of those uniforms have long since mingled with kind Mother Earth, and sweet perfumes exhaled by flowers which bloom or fall upon those graves remind us that the war is over.

Will you not hearken to the words of Grant, the soldier and the patriot? "Let us have peace." [Applause.]

[During the delivery of the foregoing remarks the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I ask that the gentleman may be permitted to proceed for a few minutes longer.

Mr. COLEMAN. I shall only ask the time of the House for two or three minutes longer.

Mr. CHADLE. I hope it will be granted.

The SPEAKER. It will have to be taken out of the time of the other side, and the Chair has been given a list here which will occupy all of the remaining time.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have three minutes to conclude his remarks, to be taken out of the time on that side.

There was no objection.

[Mr. COLEMAN resumed and concluded his remarks as above.]

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I also represent a district in the South. I was born and reared in the South and my people have always lived in the South. I have been identified with that section of the country and am familiar with the manners, the customs, as well as with the institutions of the South. I was familiar with the institution of slavery from my earliest recollection. My generations before me have always been of the South. My people were slave-owners, and that question is one with which I have been long familiar; but though they were slave-owners they were always patriots.

I have the honor to represent as best I know how on this floor a white constituency that believe, each and every one of them, that his vote ought to count in this Government just as much as the vote of any other man, let him live North, South, East, or West. [Applause on the Republican side.] My people have been taught to believe that whenever the vote of a man who is legally and constitutionally entitled to vote has voted that that vote counts just as much as the vote of the President of the United States, and that the Government has guaranteed and will secure to him the right to see that that vote counts for just as much.

For myself, I undertake to say here and now that I would feel myself humiliated in my own conscience, and would degrade myself in my own estimation and in the estimation of my friends and my family, if I should undertake to occupy a seat on this floor in the House of Representatives to which I was not honestly and fairly elected by a majority of the votes of the people I claim to represent. And I do not believe that any other gentleman in good conscience, before God and his country, ought to be willing to come to this House and take a seat here and undertake to legislate for the people of the United States unless he has been sent here by the free votes and the expressed will of the sovereign people of the State whom he claims to represent as his constituency. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But it has been published broadcast through the Democratic press of this country that the Speaker of this House, in connection with certain members of the House, have promulgated a line of legislation by which they propose, through the enactment of certain laws in Congress, to perpetuate themselves in power. And it has been alleged that the balance of the Republican party in Congress are simply whipped in by the party lash to obey the behests of the Speaker and other leaders of the Republican party.

For myself, Mr. Speaker, I have been always in favor of a free ballot and a fair count, and I did not have to be "whipped in," nor do I believe that any other patriotic citizen has to be whipped in to insure his faithful discharge of a great public duty. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But we have been told by my honorable friend who has just taken his seat [Mr. COLEMAN] that if this bill passes it will bring about an era of bloodshed and destruction, as well as misery, and the demoralization of business interests in the South. Is that so? Is there a feeling or a sentiment existing amongst the people of the United States that would lead to the disfranchisement of millions of its citizens?

You on that side of the House and from the South have said to the people of the United States that the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution were right, which guaranty the civil rights of the negro and the right to exercise the privileges of citizenship at the polls by having their ballots cast and their votes counted. Do you propose to go back upon your promises in that regard? Is this a representative Government, and are the negroes or the poor white men of the South entitled to no privileges of citizens; that they shall not have their votes cast and counted for their choice [applause on the Republican side] if you do not oppose the Constitution and fair elections?

Why do you oppose this bill? It insures an absolutely fair election of Representatives and Delegates in Congress. You talk about blocks of five, and fraudulent returning boards in Louisiana, and the corruption of the Republican party as a justification for violence, for murder, for stuffing ballot-boxes, for frauds in election cases in the South as though that would appease the people of this country in their demands for honest elections. Is that your reason for opposing a measure which is admittedly constitutional and confessedly in accord with the decisions of the highest tribunal of the land and demanded by every patriotic citizen?

But what does the bill do? Does it prevent any legal voter from voting as he pleases and having his vote counted? No. Does it enable anybody to perpetrate fraud on the ballot-box? No; on the contrary, it provides just the reverse. Does it prevent the law from being enforced upon anybody who commits fraud in regard to the ballot? No; but it guarantees to the humblest individual in the land, North, South, East, or West, the fullest right to go and cast his vote, and to have that vote counted as cast.

Why, Mr. Speaker, before the war, in the electoral college and Congress gentlemen of the South counted three-fifths of the negroes in representation, although they were property. Since the war they boast, for I have been in the farther South since the war, and they have said to me, with profanity, "Before the war we counted three-fifths of the negroes in the electoral college and in Congress; now we intend to count five-fifths, and the negro shall not vote, or, if so, he shall not be counted." Thereby a Southern gentleman, by his bulldozing tactics and frauds at election, makes himself equal to five free white intelligent votes in other sections of the country.

Mr. Speaker, not only do the colored people ask protection in this regard, but the free white voters in the South ask that the ballot-box be purified. I can not understand how it is that this bill is to arouse so much feeling on the part of gentlemen on the other side. Do you intend, as your manner indicates, to bring bloodshed on the country if this law is enacted and enforced? Do you hope in the face of the letter of the law to bully anybody or scare anybody from the proper enforcement of the law? [Applause on the Republican side.]

That time has passed, and you gentlemen will pause when you go home to your constituents and this matter is discussed there. This is not a question of politics. If you want to discuss this question, go before them. Discuss the educational question, discuss the tariff; go amongst the farmers and amongst the laboring men and tell them that the hypocritical—no, I will take that back—but the cry over their condition was all assumed.

If you will discuss these questions with these people they will divide with you. They do not want supremacy; all they want is fair dealing and a fair show in the State as well as in the nation. And you have no right to control the legislation of this House by votes that are not cast and are not counted. Why, Mr. Speaker, the Catholics have the power to control this nation; the Irish, the Germans, if they unite, because they hold the balance of power. The laboring men have the power to control this nation, and by the bye, I will say to my friends through the South that you will hear the voice of the laboring man and the farmer coming up and demanding this legislation whereby they will be no longer governed and controlled by the shotguns in the hands of the White Liners and ku klux and driven to vote the Democratic ticket whether it suits them or not, for they are organizing to-day, and the question of the tariff, the question of wages, and the question of who shall rule them will be brought in issue in your districts and in the South.

I undertake to say here, inasmuch as other men have prophesied, that there is not a district represented south of Mason and Dixon's line to-day that, if the question of the tariff is discussed fairly by two Democrats, and let them divide upon the question of the tariff and discuss it before the white and the colored people, there is not a district that would be represented by the so-called reformed Democrat in this House in the Fifty-second Congress or any one to come hereafter. The laboring people are in the majority in the South, but have been dictated to by their leaders, who make great professions of friendship and perform none of them. They cover up all of these questions and prevent their discussion by talking about "negro equality" and the "great Democratic party," and by proscribing the man who adheres to the contrary sentiment in opposition to the idea that the Democrats must rule.

I trust that this bill will pass. It can not hurt anybody if no one is guilty of fraud in elections, and if they are guilty of fraud upon the elective franchise they ought to be punished, and this bill will certainly do it. I most cheerfully indorse the bill as the best election bill that has ever been offered to any Congress in this country or in its history. But mark my prediction, Mr. Speaker, when you see the Democratic press and the Democratic orators, from little ones to great ones, all over the country, denouncing a measure that is offered by the Republican party, if you will pardon the phrase, you may bet your bottom dollar it is going to hurt somebody in the elections that are to come. You talk about this "force bill." What have you done in Kentucky? Talk about fairness. You send here under your gerrymandering proposition ten Democrats with 181,000 votes, while it takes 156,000 to send one Republican. You disfranchise honest men, over 80,000 white men, of whom are the soldiers and their sons, yes, over 125,000; for we polled 156,000 for the President of the United States. Yet 181,000 Democratic votes can send ten Representatives to the House of Representatives to advocate free trade against the interest of the State, to advocate a policy that will prevent its development. And yet they say, "Why, my God Almighty, just see how we are developing the South!" [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Who are developing the South? Who owns the South to-day? Who owns our iron lands and our valuable timber belts, and owns our valuable mines and factories? Do these Southern men that advocate free trade own them? Not a bit of it. It is the enterprising, thrifty, intelligent Northern and Eastern men and foreign capitalists that have made their money and have gone there and are building up the country for them. And even when they do it, they take their lives in their hands in many instances, and in other instances social ostracism is brought to bear against them to prevent them from prospering, even though they are invited to come.

I hate to hear my Southern friends boast of their enterprise, when in point of fact if they had had their way there would not have been a dollar invested in the South to-day. Now we want protection to these men that go there, we want protection to the men that are there, we want a state of case brought about which this will bring, whereby men may discuss freely without intimidation the questions at issue before the American people, and when they are discussed that they can carry out their own judgment as to what is to their interest and the interest of their country, and go to the polls with as free a ballot as we have in my district in Kentucky, where each man votes as he pleases, and where there is a real good feeling between both parties, and each one rather than see a man deprived of his vote at the polls, if he is entitled to vote, although he may vote against his neighbor, yet will go with him to the polls and see that he exercises his right to cast that ballot as he wishes to cast it and have it counted.

That is the sentiment that ought to exist instead of getting up a great ado and trying to arouse the feelings of the American people from one end of the country to the other. Why should this bill not pass if we do not want fraud? Why not, if we do not want to represent a constituency that did not vote for us? Why, if we want free and fair elections, can we not unite upon this measure? There ought not to be any politics in it. The law is not political. It will hurt the Republicans where they attempt fraud. It will hurt the Democrats where they attempt fraud. And it will hurt both of them if they seek power by fraud.

Why, you can not bribe anybody, you can not swear to any lies, and you can not stuff any ballot-boxes. You can not kill members of Congress, you can not take leaders out and hang them, and you can not muster men with double-barreled shotguns to scare and shoot people. Why, I am a little inclined to think, Mr. Speaker, there is a mistake about this thing, and that these gentlemen have got back into the days of the war and of reconstruction, when men's blood was hot, when at the least insult or indignity men came to blows, and when assassinations were common, when ku klux and White Liners were organized.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, the bill will pass. I quite agree with some of the things said by my friend from Louisiana [Mr. COLEMAN], but if you will put him on the stand and ask him, "Well, Mr. COLEMAN, when you were a candidate, did you not want every man who was for you to have the right to cast his vote for you without being hindered?" He will answer, "Oh, yes." "Do you not wish every such vote counted for you?" He will say "O, yes; I do."

"Well, if you want that for yourself and wanted it then, are you not willing to agree that we shall have the same for every man who seeks to come to Congress, or his party friends seek to send to Congress?" Why not? Oh, well, he is an "accident" here. He is a good man, worthy, and a patriot; but he is an "accident?" Accidentally he got back to a certain polling place in his district in time to keep the Democratic officers of election from counting him out. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I enter this debate because I feel the profoundest solicitude for the safety of our institutions. I believe that the cause of good government itself depends upon the result of this measure. What is there in our situation that invites this new crusade against my section? In a time of profound peace, when the business interests of this country are cementing together again in bonds of brotherhood alienated peoples, when the young men of the North are finding employment, when the capital, enterprise, and energy of that section are finding safe and profitable investments in the South, when, by processes as silent as the processes of nature, States lately engaged in war are rejoicing in a real restoration of the Union, and when Southern representatives of the Republican party stand upon this floor and ask to be saved from their friends, I ask in all conscience what excuse is there for kindling again the fires of political persecution?

As the record is about to be made up upon the transactions of this Congress, and clear and sharp issues have been defined between the two great parties, when we are about to go before the country we want a fair trial; instead we are offered a revolution. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] who introduced this bill and is managing it on the floor cites the transactions of John Davenport and his supervisors in New York and the results of their interference with the elections as a precedent to justify this departure from the laws of the land. The gentleman shall not pervert the history of a most impressive incident.

The people of the great metropolis themselves, by their own agencies, unmasked the transactions of their corrupt ring, and under the leadership of Samuel J. Tilden sent the rascals to the penitentiary or dispersed them throughout the world. It was not in any way due to the interference of Congress. That storm of indignation was a local affair, and is a splendid illustration of the wisdom of trusting the people with the settlement of their own concerns. And the great State of New York, out of gratitude, made the leader of that reform their governor, and the people afterwards made him President of the United States. [Applause.]

Why he was never inaugurated President of the United States can be explained only by the well known fact that he and the people were cheated out of their own by returning boards such as are created in this bill and the intervention of a Federal judge. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, this statute is to be executed by the plain people of this country. They leave the farm, the shop, and the counter and go to the polls to receive the suffrages of freemen in the selection of their public servants. You propose to leave to them the execution of this statute of seventy-six pages, stuffed with pains and penalties from one end to the other, with more felonies and crimes and punishments than any statute ever enacted, and so full of complications and intricacies that gentlemen who formulated it do not understand it.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL], one of its professed authors, did not know that it authorizes an unlimited number of special deputy marshals! On this floor there is a difference of opinion as to whether it authorizes the employment of troops at the polls, a prerogative which no statesman would leave in doubt. And yet the plain people of this country are to administer it at their peril. When you enact a law for the government of railroads, you know that those corporations have able counsel, and you have provided for them a high tribunal to settle disputes that may arise as to the construction of the statute. When you enact a law to change the practice of the courts of the country, you know that there are learned judges to decide difficult matters after the arguments of able lawyers. If you change the practice in any of the Departments of the Government, you provide those Departments with law clerks, with Solicitors-General and Attorneys-General to guide and direct the learned Secretary; but when you make a law to be administered by the untutored and unaided citizens who are to preside over the very sources of all power in this country, they must execute it correctly or go to jail. And to make this bill of pains and penalties and infinite complications effective against our masters, it is proposed to try them in the United States courts and deny them a jury of their peers.

The act of 1879, which provides that jury-lists in the Federal courts shall be made up by the clerk and a commissioner of a different party from the party of the clerk was a compromise measure, originating in a spirit of obvious fairness. On that compromise, in a large degree, proceeded the pacification of the country. It was on this foundation that confidence in the justice of the Government and in the fairness of its courts was again encouraged in the South.

This bill proposes to repeal that great safeguard of liberty and leave the jury-lists to be made alone by the Republican clerks of court. Offenders indicted under this bill, if they are Republicans, are to be tried by their friends, and if they are Democrats, are to be indicted and tried for political offenses by their political enemies. I say, Mr. Speaker, that rather than have such a jury trial as this bill provides I would prefer to have the institution of trial by jury abolished altogether.

Now look at another feature of this bill. Up to 1863 gentlemen who had certificates entitling them to seats upon this floor brought them here and presented them, and their sufficiency was determined during the first hours of the organization of the House of Representatives. In 1863 that law was changed, so that the Clerk of the House was authorized to make up the roll of members; but that act, passed in a period of great confusion, provided that the Clerk should place upon the roll those who were accredited in regular form according to the laws of the States. That statute has stood ever since. It survived the war. It survived reconstruction.

Yet now you propose to supersede that practice. Where trust and confidence and mutual interest require that we should appeal to the highest right and settle these matters according to principles in which all patriots should concur, you provide by this bill that the certificate of a returning board in judicial districts shall determine the right of a member to have his name entered upon the roll. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that when that question comes here to be determined at the organization of the next House of Representatives you will place this country under a strain not paralleled since the days of the disputed Presidential count.

The people of this country will not trust the decisions of your partisan returning boards. They may submit, if they will, as they have submitted before. The peace of the country may be again due to the forbearance of the party to which I belong; but, according to the traditions of liberty, according to the maxims which have governed this Anglo-Saxon race to which we all belong, you might as well place dynamite under the house and put at hazard every interest of this country. It is the work of an anarchist. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If it is statesmanship, it is the statesmanship of Guy Fawkes. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that in addition to the pains and penalties which this act provides, one gentleman on the other side [Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa] has sent after it the menace of a "killing bullet." It may be that I should "be frightened when a madman stares." I have been taught, sir, in the hard, stern school of adversity. No imprudent declamation shall escape my lips on this occasion, but I tell you that behind me and behind every Representative on this side and behind every gentleman on that side there is a deep undercurrent of fair play which will rise in indignation against this usurpation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

As to that section of the country from which I come, I shall pay its people no tribute; but I trust I may be permitted to read here and now a few words recently uttered in another place by a gentleman who stands high in the councils of the Republican party, and who himself advocates a measure of this kind. I refer to the Hon. Mr. HOAR, of Massachusetts. Speaking of the Southern people, he said:

I am saying this of a people with as gallant, noble, and honorable traits, when this race prejudice does not get possession of their souls, as ever existed on the face of the earth. They have some qualities which I can not even claim in an equal degree for the people among whom I myself dwell. They have an aptness for command which makes a Southern gentleman, wherever he goes, not a peer only, but a prince. They have a love of home; they have, the best of them and the most of them, inherited from the great race from which they come the sense of duty and the instinct of honor as no other people on the face of the earth. They are lovers of home. They have not the mean traits that grow up in places where money-making is the chief end of life. They have, above all and giving value to all, that supreme and superb constancy which, without regard to personal ambition and without yielding to the temptations of wealth, without getting tired and without being diverted, can pursue a great public object in and out, year after year, and generation after generation.

Mr. Speaker, I rely on these high characteristics which this honorable gentleman has imputed to our people as a means of safety, not only for them, but for all the rest of the country.

The gentleman who proposes this bill once entertained very different opinions from those which he now advocates. On the 4th day of July, 1879, before the honorable mayor and council of the city of Boston, he made a speech full of sentiments worthy of a statesman. Speaking of the principle of State rights, he said:

It is the great Anglo-Saxon principle of local self-government and is the safeguard of our liberties now as it has ever been in the past. Without it there is no health in us. It should be more jealously watched than any other, because the tendency in large communities is always towards centralization.

Our Government is a system of checks and balances. Destroy one element and the whole fabric falls. Nationality is strong and safe. Our most important duty is to protect our local rights wherever they exist and feel as the Colonies did when the Boston port bill passed, that the cause of one is the cause of all. [Applause.]

I commend these utterances of the patriot in private life to the politician of to-day!

APPENDIX.

I add the following sketch as appropriate to this discussion. It was prepared by me as a contribution to a book published by Mr. HERBERT, of Alabama, entitled, Why the Solid South? or, Reconstruction and its Results.

SOME REMINISCENCES OF THE RECONSTRUCTION OF GEORGIA.

"A military republic, a government founded on mock elections and supported only by the sword, is a movement indeed, but a retrograde and disastrous movement from the regular and old-fashioned monarchical systems."

"Absurd, preposterous is it, a scoff and a satire on free forms of constitutional liberty for frames of government to be prescribed by military leaders, and the right of suffrage to be exercised at the point of the sword."—Daniel Webster.

The Confederacy of Southern States had perished. Its great commanders had in succession surrendered their swords, and their ragged and hungry soldiers, weary of strife, had returned to their desolated homes. Mr. Davis was a captive, and the members of his cabinet were either prisoners or exiles. There was sincere and universal submission to the authority of the United States.

The invading armies could not find a single armed enemy from Maryland to the Mexican border. Soon after the crops of that disastrous year had been planted masters called up their slaves and informed them that they were free. The plow stood still and the freedmen went to town. All the agencies of commerce were either destroyed or suspended. The private debts of a prosperous era had survived the means of payment. Of money, there was none. The banks were broken, and the treasuries of the towns, cities, counties, and State were empty. Notes and bills of the State had become uncurrent, and the Treasury notes and bank bills of the United States had not yet flowed into the country. There was cotton, now becoming valuable, stored away against the evil day, but army officers and Treasury agents were hunting this last resource of a ruined people with unrelenting rapacity. The railroads were wrecked and had no means with which to replace their tracks and rolling-stock.

Cities and great tracts of country were in ashes. Colleges and schools were silent, the teachers without pupils and the children without teachers. Even the great charities and asylums of the State, at this time when they were most needed, were unable to take care of lunatics, the deaf and dumb and blind. From Tennessee to Savannah, a region 20 miles wide, had been ravaged, and even the seed-corn, implements of husbandry, and farm animals had been destroyed or removed by the army of General Sherman. The means of social enjoyment were wanting and thousands lacked even the means of subsistence. And over this scene of confusion and wretchedness hung like a pall the apprehension of pains and penalties, of proscription and humiliation.

There has not been such an opportunity for statesmanship since the war of the Revolution. The white population of the State in 1860 was 591,550, and yet the State had furnished to the Confederate armies 120,000 soldiers. (See address by the historian and scholar, Col. C. C. Jones, Jr., LL. D., made at Augusta April 26, 1899.) Such unanimity and devotion were without a parallel in history. To support the cause of independence the fortunes and lives of the entire people had been pledged. It is obvious that persecution would only endear that cause to all Georgians. On the other hand, magnanimous treatment would have vindicated those who had deprecated secession, and would have discredited the wisdom of those who had advocated that measure.

The Congress of the United States had in July, 1861, resolved that "this war is not waged on one part in any spirit of oppression, nor for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, nor purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those (Southern) States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired, and that so soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease."

The author of this resolution was Andrew Johnson, then a Senator from the State of Tennessee, and by the assassination of Mr. Lincoln he was now the President of the United States. If he and his party had stood by the policy announced by Congress in 1861 there would have been very few in Georgia in 1865 to defend the policy of secession.

The governor was arrested by soldiers and lodged in prison. Fetters were riveted upon Mr. Davis and he was kept in close custody for two years without bail and without a trial. Garrisons of United States troops, often colored soldiers, invaded every county and took charge of every court-house. The Freedmen's Bureau interposed between the farmers and their late slaves, and inaugurated distrust and estrangement where there should have been kindness and sympathy.

Martial law and military tribunals displaced the old system of justice and the ancient jurisprudence. Justice was sold, and a recovery was a military capture. The writer saw a trial of a case of trover between two citizens before an Ohio Lieutenant in uniform without a jury. There was complete strangulation of the State, and the only security of life or property was the military power or the strong hand. And in these conditions can be found the germs of the hostility which ensued between the races, and of the alienation which finally made the South solid against the Republican party.

On the 29th of May, 1865, was published the President's proclamation of amnesty, from which were excepted fourteen classes. These excepted classes included persons of experience and influence, all of whom would have gladly co-operated in the work of restoration, and also those "the estimated value of whose taxable property was over $20,000."

The proclamation was in effect an executive decree of wholesale outlawry, and strange as it may appear to lawyer and layman, informations were soon afterwards filed in the United States court by the district attorney, praying confiscation of the property of the proscribed classes. And these disgraceful proceedings, wholly unwarranted by law, resulted at least in a harvest of costs exacted as a condition of settlement from people who were unable to bear the burden. This abuse of judicial process, previously unknown in the South, soon became familiar as a means of extortion, and has not yet been fully eradicated in cases in which the Government is a party. Examples are not lacking to re-enforce this statement.

On the 17th of June of the same year the President issued a proclamation by which James Johnson was appointed provisional governor of the State, whose duty it should be at the earliest practicable period to prescribe such rules and regulations as might be necessary and proper for convening a convention composed of delegates to be chosen by that portion of the people of the State who were loyal to the United States; and the proclamation further provided that no person should be qualified as an elector or should be eligible as a member of such convention unless he had been amnestied and was a voter qualified as prescribed by the constitution and laws in force prior to the 9th of January, 1861, the date of the attempted secession of the State. And the proclamation further directed the military and naval officers and forces in the department of Georgia to aid and assist the provisional governor; and the State, the Treasury, the Interior, and Post-Office Departments were directed to see that the laws of their respective Departments were put in operation in the State, and the district judge for the district of Georgia was instructed to hold his courts.

The Attorney-General was directed to instruct the proper officers to libel and bring to judgment, confiscation, and sale property subject to confiscation. And the President further directed that if suitable residents could not be found for the Federal appointments in the State then the several Departments should make the appointments from other States. The citizens of the State being disfranchised as to Federal offices by the test oath, this proclamation was the first invitation to the carpet-baggers. They became very important factors in the subsequent history of the State.

This scheme of the President was a great departure from the plan of restoration which he had himself embodied in the resolutions of Congress before cited. But the provisional governor entered upon his duties with the earnest co-operation of the people, because an opportunity seemed to have arrived for the substitution of civil government for military despotism. To the convention which was soon after called, there were chosen delegates of known conservatism, and in many cases men who were originally opposed to secession. The ordinance of secession was formally repealed or rescinded, and a constitution was framed and adopted abolishing slavery and conforming the State in all respects to the new conditions.

Under pressure from Washington, by the President and members of Congress, an ordinance was adopted by the convention for the repudiation of bonds, treasury notes, and other obligations issued by the State during the period of the war. These securities had been sought by guardians and trustees for the investment of funds in their hands, and all prudent citizens hoarded them with care. The act of the convention by which they were declared null brought ruin on many widows and orphans, and reduced to penury many citizens too old to start life over again.

The Congress then in office was engaged in the consideration of a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States so as to nullify these State obligations, and it was finally embodied in the fourteenth amendment. And these incidents first prepared the public mind to determine the legality of obligations of the State having the apparent sanction of law. The precedent was afterward followed with good reason, when the people recovered their liberties in 1871.

The General Assembly, chosen by the people as the constitution provided, soon afterwards met at Milledgeville, in the old capital, and Charles J. Jenkins, a man of exalted character, an old Whig, was inaugurated as governor.

The Legislature laid the necessary taxes, made the appropriations required for the support of the government, provided funds by loans for the immediate wants of the State, ratified the thirteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, invested the negroes with all the civil rights of white persons, except the right to vote and to hold office, and in fact, with all the privileges and guarantees enjoyed by them in many of the Northern States. Under these new laws the white people of the State were allowed no greater superiority over negroes than the white citizens of the District of Columbia had over the colored population under the laws of Congress.

Alexander H. Stephens and Herschel V. Johnson, both of whom have been ardent Union men, Mr. Johnson having been a candidate for the Vice-Presidency on the ticket with Mr. Douglas, and Mr. Stephens a zealous and able champion of that ticket, and both of whom had in the convention of 1861 eloquently resisted secession, were chosen as Senators of the United States.

It should also be noted that this General Assembly refused to ratify the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States chiefly because it imposed political disabilities upon the leading men of the State for no other reason than that they had served the people in the various positions to which they had been elected or appointed.

In March, 1866, Congress passed a concurrent resolution that no Senator or Representative should be admitted into either branch of Congress from any of the eleven States which had been declared to be in insurrection until Congress should declare such States entitled to representation. Mr. Stephens and Mr. Johnson were repulsed from the Senate, and the gentlemen who had been elected to the House were scarcely able to present their credentials. Thus ignominiously failed the policy of restoration which the President had formulated and which seemed to coincide with the plan of Mr. Lincoln, and thenceforth the old Union party in Georgia almost disappeared. This flouting of the President and the revengeful temper of Congress, as shown in the debates of that period, against the white people of the South dispelled all delusions, and all differences in that section practically ceased.

Leaving out of view the memory of long years of common sufferings and misfortunes, they had the same apprehensions of approaching oppression. Their only enemies in Congress belonged to the Republican party, and they were bitter and vindictive; their only friends in power were Democrats. Their situation united them with each other and with the Democratic party.

All the measures of the Republican party from this time forth, touching Southern affairs, treated the Southern States, not as States in the Union upon the theory of the Constitution on which the war had been fought, but as conquered provinces.

On the 16th of July, 1866, Congress passed an act extending the provisions of the act establishing the bureau for the relief of freedmen, and enacting that the commissioner should, under the direction of the President, appoint such agents, clerks, and assistants as might be required for the proper conduct of the bureau. No limit was fixed for the number of these agents, and they were to be so far deemed in the military service of the United States as to be under the military jurisdiction and entitled to the military protection of the Government. And the act further provided that the President should, through the commissioner and the officers of the bureau and under such rules and regulations as the President, through the Secretary of War, should prescribe, extend military protection and have military jurisdiction over all cases and questions concerning the free enjoyment of the personal immunities and rights conferred by the act until the State should be duly represented in the Congress of the United States.

Thus every bureau agent was a court with military jurisdiction. Such a court was established in every county of the State. These special tribunals were officered by persons who could take the test oath, and became the nurseries from which aliens and strangers disseminated among the negroes hate and rancor toward the white citizens. And Congress, on the 13th of the same month, appropriated $6,887,700 for the fiscal year beginning with the first day of the month for the support of the bureau, for salaries, clothing for distribution, for commissary stores, medical department, transportation, school-teachers, repairs, and rents of school-houses and asylums.

Power limited by none of the safeguards to which freemen had been accustomed, the creation of an army of officers and employes whose number and functions were prescribed not by Congress, but by the executive branch, and a prodigal appropriation of money to be distributed by these officers without any defined accountability were the prerogatives conferred on this extraordinary institution; and the administration of the system inevitably provoked irritation between the races, tempted the agents to foment the disorders by which their continuance in office could be secured, and attracted the freedmen from the farms to the towns. In the towns the bureau located the schools and dispensed provisions and mendicancy and prejudice, and heard complaints.

In 1867 the acts known as the reconstruction acts of Congress were passed over the President's veto. These acts subordinated all government existing in the State to a military commander, conferring on him the authority to administer all the powers of the State, authorizing him to remove whom he pleased, and life and liberty were subject to such military commissions or tribunals as he might create. The courts of the State could sit, but only by permission of the general in command.

Those who had been members of any State Legislature or held any executive or judicial office in any State and afterwards engaged in the war against the United States were disfranchised, and the other male persons in the State, without regard to color or previous condition, should be registered as voters by the officers of military creation, and these registered persons might vote at the election held under military supervision for or against a convention and for delegates to form a new constitution for the State if a majority should be cast for a convention.

Congress by disfranchising and enfranchising whom it pleased fixed the basis of suffrage in the State. And one of these acts (that of July 19) enacted that no district commander, or member of the board of registration, or any of the officers or appointees acting under them should be bound by any opinion of any civil officer of the United States. By the operation of these acts Georgia was reduced to a mere military district, in which the will of the commanding general was supreme, with no right of appeal from his orders to any court or to any civil officer of the State or of the General Government.

The details of these acts have already been sufficiently stated in a previous chapter, and the study of them can afford no pleasure to any American citizen. The registration took place substantially as Congress prescribed, and by General Pope's order the election was held on the 29th, 30th, and 31st of October, and on the 1st and 2d of September, 1867, the polls being kept open for five days under the management of army officers, and with troops convenient to every voting-place.

By a general order from the headquarters of the district the convention was declared to have been carried, and the delegates of the Republican party were declared elected. The delegates were ordered to meet in convention, not at Milledgeville, the capital of the State, but at Atlanta, on the 9th day of December, and proceed to frame a constitution and civil government for the State.

When the convention met Foster Boggett, afterwards a fugitive from the State, was elected temporary chairman, and on taking the chair, among other things, said: "To-day the Republic is free! This convention is a splendid exemplification of the fact. Gentlemen, I tender you my congratulations. The whole civilized world greet you to-day, assembled as the representatives of the people of the free State of Georgia!" And the permanent president, on assuming the chair, said that "it will gladden every patriotic heart to know that liberty still lives in our grand old Commonwealth."

These fine sentiments were uttered not far from General Pope's headquarters, and the first resolutions adopted after the organization informed him that, "in obedience to his orders, this convention is now assembled and organized and invites his presence in the convention at his pleasure."

And a few days afterwards he was met at the door of the hall by a committee and escorted in uniform and with a clanking sword, amid applause, to the right of the president.

Speeches were made on this occasion, but the manliest was made by General Pope. Soon after the convention met the delegates realized that no fund had been provided to pay for their patriotic services, and an ordinance was passed to levy and collect a tax for that purpose; but as the slow process of taxation could not relieve immediately wants the ordinance further directed the treasurer of the State to advance to the convention out of the treasury $40,000.

The treasurer refused to honor this requisition, in the absence of an executive warrant. General Pope having been removed by the President from the command of the district, his successor, General Meade, early in January, 1868, required Governor Jenkins to issue a warrant for the sum demanded by the convention. The governor refused to comply, on the ground that the constitution of the State, which he had sworn to support, expressly provided that no money should be taken from the treasury except by executive warrant upon appropriations made by law. The new commander thereupon issued an order deposing the governor, State treasurer, and comptroller-general, and appointed army officers to execute their functions.

The gubernatorial appointee of General Meade, on presenting himself to assume the government of the State, read, in answer to a question, an extract from his instructions directing him, in case of resistance, to employ such force as may be necessary. Governor Jenkins, in his account of the affair, said that as far as was practicable in the brief interval allowed him he placed the movable values of the State, and certainly the money then in the treasury, beyond reach; but these military men took actual possession of the State capitol and its grounds, of the executive mansion and its furniture, and of the archives of the State, proceeded to collect taxes, seized upon the income of the Western and Atlantic Railroad, then in good order and successful operation, and secured all the revenues of the State subsequently flowing into the treasury.

Governor Jenkins, as soon as action was taken under the reconstruction acts, had repaired to Washington and filed a bill in the Supreme Court in the name of the State against General Pope and others, seeking to enjoin any proceedings under these acts, as infringements of the Constitution of the United States. Permission was given to file the bill—and only a State in the Union could file such a bill in that court—but it was dismissed after argument on the ground that it alleged neither interference nor the threat of interference with the property of the State, which allegation the court held was necessary to make a case for their consideration.

When the subsequent seizure of the great offices of the State and all of its accessible property occurred, Governor Jenkins, deeming himself still the rightful governor of the State, again went before the Supreme Court alleging these facts, and permission was given to file the bill; but the permission was revoked the next day and a new rule of practice devised and enforced, which compelled delays, and finally the learned counsel for the State, Mr. O'Connor, Mr. Black, Mr. Field, and others, were told that there did not remain of the term time enough to hear and determine a motion for injunction. Before the commencement of the next term the Atlanta convention had done its work. (See the report made by Governor Jenkins in 1872, House Journal, p. 405.)

On the 11th of March the convention adopted an ordinance providing that should it be necessary for the convention after its adjournment to reassemble it should do so at the call of its president or its president pro tempore, or in default of both, by the general commanding the third military district, and ordained that an election should be held beginning 20th of April following, at such places as might be designated by the commanding general for voting on the ratification of the new constitution and for the election of governor, members of the General Assembly, Representatives in Congress, and other officers; said election to be kept open from day to day at the discretion of the commanding general, and the qualification of voters were to be the same as those prescribed by the act of Congress known as the Sherman bill, and General Meade was requested to give the necessary orders and cause due returns to be made and certificates of election to issue.

The military commander published general orders on the 14th and 15th of March, assuming entire charge of the election, providing that it should commence on the 20th of April and continue for four days, prescribing the minutest details and providing that sheriffs and other civil officers failing to perform with energy and good faith the duties required of them, and citizens charged with violation of the right of suffrage, should be tried and punished by the military authority, and directing that the returns of the election should be made to himself.

The constitution so made and submitted to the people was framed by delegates elected almost entirely by those who had no right to vote according to the laws of the State, the white people having almost universally refused to participate in the election. It proposed the enfranchisement of the colored people, and they were to vote on the proposition, and many of the white people were not allowed this privilege. It was a curious plebiscite.

The constitution also ordained that no court in the State should have jurisdiction to try or determine any suit against any resident of the State upon any contract or agreement, made or implied, or upon any contract made in renewal of any debt existing prior to the 1st day of June, 1865, and it provided for each head of a family a homestead and exemption against his debts of the aggregate value of $5,000 in gold.

These transparent devices, with others of a similar character, were artfully designed to attract the support of the debtor class, and after the election were annulled because in conflict with the Constitution of the United States. Those who were deceived and disappointed by the scheme had no further reason in the years that followed to act with the Republican party.

In the interval between the convention and the election the white people in some sections of the State were assured by the advocates of the constitution that after its ratification negroes would not be eligible to office. The argument was that negroes had no political rights, except such as were conferred by law, and that the constitution was silent on the subject. This view undoubtedly beguiled some persons who for other reasons were inclined to vote for ratification.

Congress, on the 12th of March of this year, passed an act providing that a majority of the votes actually cast should determine the election, the previous acts having required a majority of the registered voters. There was no longer any motive for standing aloof, and Democrats as well as Republicans nominated candidates for the various offices. This policy of the Democrats possibly brought some of their voters to support the constitution, who wished their candidates to take charge of the administration.

The election was held on the appointed days, and General Meade declared that the constitution was ratified, and that Rufus B. Bullock, the Republican candidate for governor, was elected over John B. Gordon.

On the 4th of July the new General Assembly met under orders from Mr. Bullock and General Meade. The governor-elect, relying on a military edict, assumed the chair and proceeded to organize the two bodies. A secretary was designated by him to call the roll of the senate and senators were requested to present themselves and take the oath of office. A Democratic senator inquired of the chairman whether objection to the qualification of any senator could at this juncture be entertained. The chairman decided in the negative, and the call of the roll proceeded.

After the senators had taken the oath, the chairman ordered an election for president. This order having been executed, and the Republican candidate, Benjamin Conley, having received 23 votes, the chairman declared him duly elected president of the senate. The journal further recites that the election of a secretary of the senate was next "ordered." And after the president had made a speech, the governor-elect withdrew. This ceremony was then repeated in the house of representatives, mutatis mutandis. The governor-elect put himself in the chair, caused to be called the roll of the members-elect prepared by General Meade and "ordered" the election of a speaker. During the call of the roll, Mr. Scott moved to adjourn.

The chair decided the motion out of order. Mr. Scott appealed to the house and the chairman declared that there could be no appeal except to the military. Mr. Scott appealed to the military, receiving no response, and the secretary proceeded with the call. R. L. McWhorter, Republican, was by the chairman declared elected, and to him the governor yielded the chair.

In reply to a communication from the General Assembly, notifying him through a joint committee that the organization of the two houses had been perfected, the governor-elect transmitted a letter from General Meade in which the commanding general informed his excellency that he had no instructions to give further than to make known that in his judgment neither house was legally organized until it was purged of members ineligible under the reconstruction acts. Committees were then appointed in each house charged with the duty of reporting upon the eligibility of members, and upon their reports each house resolved that all its members were eligible.

General Meade, in his report, states that the provisional governor, in communicating to him this action of each house, nevertheless "expressed his opinion, founded on evidence presented to him, that several members of both houses were ineligible and called on me to exercise my power and require said members to vacate their seats. On reflecting upon this subject I could not see how I was to take the individual judgment of the provisional governor in the face of a solemn act of a parliamentary body, especially as from the testimony presented I did not in several cases agree with the judgment of the provisional governor. * * * My judgment was decidedly that I had fulfilled my duty in compelling the houses to take the action they had, and that having thus acted I had neither the authority, nor was it politic or expedient, to overrule their action and set up my judgment in opposition. * * * I allude thus in extenso to this subject because his excellency the governor of Georgia, in a public speech recently delivered at Albion, N. Y., is pleased to attribute the failure of Georgia to be properly reconstructed to my action in failing to purge the Legislature of his political opponents, he having advised me when he urged such action that his friends had been relieved of their disability by Congress." (For this report, see Senate Election Cases, pages 231, 232.) The provisional governor seems to have been trying in his own way to reset the result of the late election, and to use the blunt soldier for that purpose, as he had already done on many occasions.

General Meade, on the 20th of July, advised and instructed the governor that he had no further opposition to make to the two houses proceeding with the business for which they were called together, and that he considered them legally organized. The governor then also informed the General Assembly that they were required by the act of Congress of June 25, 1868, to ratify the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States. A resolution to that effect was at once proposed and adopted. The same communication from the governor informed the General Assembly that they were required "by solemn public act to declare the assent of the State to that portion of the act of Congress which makes null and void" certain parts of the new constitution which carried the taint of repudiation and impaired the obligation of contracts. And this last requirement was fulfilled. This little punctilio of Congress is a surprise under the circumstances.

Mr. Bullock dropped his provisional title. And the State became entitled to representation in Congress, according to the act of June 23. Joshua Hill and H. V. M. Miller were elected United States Senators. They were not admitted to their seats until February, 1871. There had sat in the constitutional convention thirty-three negroes, and in the General Assembly now in session about the same number of colored men had seats. They had been by their Republican associates of the white race, the carpet-baggers and other adventurers, seduced into a state of disdainful scorn of the old proprietors of power in Georgia.

Soon after the two houses had entered upon the regular business of the session, the question which had been discussed during the interval between the convention and the last election, as to the legal right of the colored people to hold office, again became a topic of great interest, and finally a resolution was introduced in each body declaring them ineligible to seats. After a long discussion, on the 3d day of September, the house by a vote of 83 to 23, passed the resolution, and twenty-five negroes ceased to be members. In the Senate, by a similar resolution, passed on the 12th day of September, two seats were vacated. Not many days after these events the candidates who received the next highest vote to that of the men of color were admitted to the vacated seats.

The governor took occasion to send a message to the house in which he inveighed against the decision of the General Assembly upon the qualifications of their own members, and his key-note was that after the surrender "we were totally without political rights or privileges. Those which we have since acquired are such as have from time to time been granted us by Congress." The view of the Supreme Court of the United States was different. That court held that "the State [Texas] did not cease to be a State, nor her citizens to be citizens of the Union." (7 Wall., 701.)

The message was returned to the governor with a resolution to the effect that his excellency did not keep their consciences.

The question of the eligibility of the negro to office in Georgia came before the supreme court of the State in 1869. That court consisted of three judges, appointed by Bullock and confirmed by the senate. Two of them were Republicans, and one was a Democrat who had sat upon that bench when the court was first organized. The case was a quo warranto brought up from the county of Chatham by a colored man against whom a judgment of outlawry from a county office had been granted by the superior court. The lower court was reversed by the two Republican judges, the Democratic judge dissenting. But it is interesting to note that one of the Republican judges, who was the chief-justice, held that the right of the negro to hold office, so far as it depended on the constitution and laws of the State, was subject to repeal by the General Assembly. (39 Gen. Report.)

The military administration of the executive and judicial departments of the State may require brief mention. The governor's functions were devolved on an officer detailed from the Army, and all the subordinate departments of the executive branch experienced the same fate. Two eminent judges of the superior court were displaced because they chose to obey the law of the State rather than military commands. And all the judges and all the county and municipal officers who were not removed held their places only by the permission or sufferance of the district commander. It is obvious that such an administration of public affairs could not have the hearty co-operation of the people. Crimes, no doubt, were committed in some instances against odious persons, and some secret murders went unpunished.

The courts were virtually suspended, and army officers and soldiers not only had no relations of confidence with the community, but were unfit for civil duties. A case in point may be given as an illustration. During the night of the 30th of March, 1868, George W. Ashburn, a white man, was assassinated in a low negro brothel in the city of Columbus. His lodging was in a back room. He had been steward in a hotel, but during the new era had served as a member of the constitutional convention. On the last day of the convention, he as one of the minority of a committee, and against the recommendation of the majority, had caused that body to pass resolutions urging Congress to remove all political disabilities from the people of the State.

It may be inferred with propriety that he was not specially offensive merely on account of his being a Republican. It was shown that he had personal enemies among his associates who had threatened to take his life. But it was at once charged that the killing was a political murder. The municipal authorities of the city nevertheless offered a reward of $500 for the assassins, and General Meade offered $2,000 for the same purpose. The election on the ratification of the constitution as well as of members of the General Assembly was to occur in a few weeks, candidates were in the field, and the excitement ran high.

The mayor and aldermen of the city were removed by General Meade, and his subalterns substituted. On the 6th of April thirteen citizens were arrested by an officer of the Army, and when asked for his authority he pointed to his file of soldiers. Nearly all the persons arrested were men of high position, who, in the opinion of the community, would not have been capable of such an atrocity. One of them was a Democratic candidate for the General Assembly (now a member of Congress), another was a candidate for a county office, and a third was the chairman of the Democratic committee conducting the canvass of his party.

It was supposed that political motives led to their arrest. They were kept for a few days under guard by soldiers in the court-house—which should have been an asylum against arbitrary arrest and imprisonment—and were then allowed to give bond for their appearance before General Meade whenever required. Three hundred and ninety-three of their neighbors eagerly became the bail of the prisoners. They were not permitted to know why they had been arrested, of what they were accused, or why they were released on bond.

During the month of May eight arrests were made and the prisoners were conveyed, under guard of soldiers, from Columbus, on the western boundary of the State, to Fort Pulaski, on the marshes below Savannah. They were confined in dark cells without ventilation and but 4 feet by 7. No bed or blankets were furnished them. An old oyster can was given each prisoner, and in this both coffee and soup were served. No kindness from their friends or relations or counsel nor any communication from them was allowed. They were forced to remain in these cells prostrated by heat and tortured by insects.

John Wells, one of these prisoners, a negro, was taken out of his cell and put into a chair in one of the casemates with a cannon pointed at his head and a soldier holding the string ready apparently to shoot the gun. A barber lathered his head, and pretended to be preparing to shave it. After ten minutes of this treatment, he was put back in his cell with the understanding that if he did not tell something it would be worse for him. Another negro prisoner, John Stapler, was put before the gun, with no success. He was afterwards put in the sweat-box, and kept in great agony for thirty hours. When removed from the box his legs were swollen.

The story of the treatment of these negroes is taken from an affidavit made in Washington by William H. Reed, one of the two detective officers employed by General Howard and General Meade to procure evidence for the Government. During the month of June fourteen arrests were made at Columbus, and the prisoners were conveyed to McPherson Barracks, near Atlanta. There they were placed in cells 6 feet wide by 10 feet long. These cells were afterwards divided by a partition, reducing their width to less than 3 feet. Neither bed nor bedding was furnished for several days. A prisoner lying on the floor [Dr. Kirk-sey] could at the same time touch the opposite walls with his elbows. The Fort Pulaski prisoners were transferred to these barracks, and after a while the new partitions were removed.

Nine of the prisoners were discharged without any explanation, four were held as witnesses, and nine were detained for trial. On the 29th of June a military commission, consisting of seven officers of high rank, was convened at McPherson barracks by order of General Meade for the trial of the prisoners. The accusation in the military form of a charge and specification alleged in technical language that they had killed and murdered George A. Ashburn, "contrary to the laws of said State, the good order, peace, and dignity thereof."

The trial proceeded for a month, able and distinguished counsel having been employed on both sides. It was watched with intense interest in all parts of the State. All the witnesses for the Government who testified to any material facts were shown by their own evidence to have been exposed to the influence of torture or fear or the promise of immunity and freedom. W. A. Duke, against whom more positive testimony was adduced than against any other defendant, was able to demonstrate by incontestable proofs and a multitude of witnesses that he was 40 miles from Columbus on the night of Ashburn's murder. General Meade then dissolved the commission on the pretext that civil government was about to be restored in Georgia, and the prisoners were abruptly discharged.

This military prosecution of honorable citizens, so full of exasperating details and conducted with such ostentatious defiance of all rights of freemen, was not calculated to attract to the Government the support of law-abiding people.

At the Presidential election of 1868 the people of Georgia gave a majority to the Democratic electors of 45,000, and the supremacy of that party in the State has been maintained at every subsequent election.

When the General Assembly met in January, 1869, the governor in his message stated that he had advised Congress that the reconstruction acts had not been fully executed in the State; that the members should have been required to take the oath (commonly known as the iron-clad oath) prescribed for officers of the United States; that the members had decided their own qualifications and had made wrong decisions, and that the result was a defeat of the purposes of Congress, "these purposes having been the establishment of a loyal and republican State government," etc.

The governor in this message, enforcing these views upon the General Assembly, quotes with approval the sentiment that "it is certainly the duty of district commanders to take what the framers of the reconstruction laws wanted to express as much as what they do express, and to execute the law according to that interpretation." And the governor, contrary to the opinion of General Grant, recommended that the persons returned as elected in April should be reassembled; that the test oath should be enforced except those who had been relieved of their disabilities, who, according to General Meade, were his friends; that this would restore the colored members; that the body thus organized should decide upon the eligibility of the excluded members, and after the work of reconstruction should be completed the test oath would not apply.

This scheme was perhaps what his excellency desired rather than what he expected at this time. It was not adopted. General Grant, the new President, was inaugurated in March of this year, and on the first Monday in December the new Congress met. On the 22d of December the President approved an "act to promote the reconstruction of the State of Georgia," which was framed according to the plan outlined and recommended by the governor.

It did not prescribe the iron-clad oath, but it provided a test oath stringent enough to exclude some persons whom the people had elected. By this act the governor was authorized and directed forthwith by proclamation to summon all persons elected to the General Assembly of the State as appeared by the proclamation of General Meade. The governor on the same day (December 22) issued a proclamation summoning all persons elected, etc., "who are qualified," to appear at Atlanta on the 10th of January, 1870. A person designated as clerk pro tempore was ordered to organize the senate on that day, and the oaths were administered by a commissioner named by the governor. Such senators as could take the new test-oaths were sworn as directed on the day appointed, and the others were excluded.

Mr. Conley was again elected president, and the two negro senators were again in their seats. The president made another inaugural speech, in which he said: "The Government has determined that in this Republic, which is not, never was, and never can be a democracy—that in this Republic Republicans shall rule."

He seems to have adopted the sentiment of the governor, expressed on a former occasion.

In the house the organization proceeded under the auspices of A. L. Harris, who was detailed by the governor for that purpose. Harris was a man from New England, of enormous girth, who recognized only such motions as he desired, and directed the proceedings according to his own taste. His will was the only parliamentary law. A member insisted that the house had the right to choose its own presiding officer even for the purpose of organization. Harris suppressed him. The incident did not appear in the journal, because he also took control of the minutes. (Senate Election Cases, page 298.) He had the roll made by General Meade called, and as each member appeared Harris directed him to be sworn alone. When he grew weary, or for other reason wished to terminate the session for the day, he announced that the House would take a recess until a time named by him.

The new reconstruction act provided that upon application of the governor the President should employ such military and naval forces as might be necessary to enforce and execute the acts, and General Terry was now the commander of the district. This officer, perhaps on the request of the governor, convened a board of military officers instructed to determine the qualifications of certain members of both houses, and the findings of this board as to the eligibility or ineligibility of any member was enforced by the orders of General Terry and re-enforced by Harris.

When the military officers had judged and determined the qualifications of senators and representatives elected by citizens and the obnoxious members had been excluded from their seats, Harris, on the 26th of January, announced that the house would proceed to the election of a speaker, and the election of Mr. McWhorter again took place. On the next day the speaker directed to be read to the house a communication from the governor presenting the names of the candidates who had received the next highest vote to that of each of the members excluded by the military orders for ineligibility. General Terry also supported this view by a letter to the governor on the day following that of the communication of his excellency to the speaker.

At first the house, no doubt remembering that the governor had regarded it as a reproach to seat minority candidates on a former occasion, refused to accede to Bullock's recommendation; but when General Terry threw his sword into the scale, the house obsequiously reversed its action, and twelve friends of the governor in this way were admitted.

In March, 1870, the Judiciary Committee of the Senate of the United States made a report reviewing this organization of the General Assembly of the State, in which report it is held that such organization was not warranted by law in the following respects:

"First. In the control and direction of its proceedings by Harris.

"Second. In the exclusion from taking the oaths and from seats of three members who offered to swear in.

"Third. In the seating of persons not having a majority of the votes of the electors."

And on January 23, 1871, the Judiciary Committee of the United States Senate, in reporting upon the credentials of Joshua Hill, H. V. M. Miller, Henry P. Farrow, and Richard H. Whiteley (the latter two having been elected by the General Assembly after the last reconstruction in 1870), affirmed the former report, and decided that Georgia was a State in the Union and entitled to representation in July, 1868, and that Hill and Miller were entitled to their seats, and they were soon after admitted as heretofore stated.

It thus appears that the Senate of the United States in December, 1869, concurred in an act entitled "An act to promote the reconstruction of the State of Georgia," and afterwards held that she was a State in the Union in 1868, and in that year lawfully elected Senators to the Congress of the United States.

The last act imposed upon the Legislature of the State a requirement that it should ratify the fifteenth constitutional amendment, and it was done to order.

From this time the governor and the General Assembly were on excellent terms, and the current of legislation encountered no obstruction. His excellency had triumphed. The State was delivered into his hands. The strangers called carpet-baggers, the Southern Republicans, called by a name still more odious, and the negro members, formed the majority of the Legislature, and between them and the executive there were the kindest relations, because he had given them power and a golden opportunity. The tax-payers almost to a man had voted against the persons who composed this majority. To these tax-payers they were objects of very general execration.

If they had not been upheld by military power they might have been carted about with placards on their backs, as were the men whom George III appointed to the Legislature of Massachusetts. The allowance was $9 a day, to say nothing of mileage, free passes, and other things. The session, with occasional short intermissions, continued from January 19 to the 25th of October. The expenditures made on account of the pay and mileage of members and officers amounted, during the term of this Legislature, to $979,953, a sum four or five times as much as was ever expended on the same account by any former Legislature. There were one hundred and four clerks, or nearly one clerk to every two members!

The constitution having conferred on the General Assembly the power to authorize the indorsement by the State of the bonds of private corporations on certain terms, there were passed at this session thirty-two acts which directed State indorsements to be placed on the bonds of as many different railroads. These indorsements so authorized, with the contingent liability created by seven other acts previously passed, would have amounted to $40,000,000. All the railroads built under these acts collapsed with a single exception, and the latter would have been built without the aid of the State. All the bonds that were so indorsed, with the same exception, were indorsed in violation of the terms prescribed by the constitution, and of the acts providing for the indorsement.

In order to hold together the combination of members who supported these measures a resolution was passed requiring "that each and every bill in which State aid is granted be retained by the president of the senate and speaker of the house, respectively, until each and every such bill is acted upon, so that they may all go to the governor at once." This arrangement pooled all their bills and consolidated all their supporting influences. It was a conspiracy which enabled every member to command the vote of every other member who had such a bill. It was supposed to have been an invention of the lobby.

During this year acts were passed authorizing the governor to issue $2,000,000 of 7 per cent. currency bonds upon which to obtain temporary loans for immediate use, also three millions of 7 per cent. gold bonds for the purpose of redeeming bonds of the State, and "for such other purposes as the General Assembly might direct." These issues were made, it is to be remembered, although the ordinary revenues of the State were ample for all legitimate expenditures. Under another act passed this year the governor delivered to a railroad company bonds of the State to the amount of $1,800,000, the State having already under another act indorsed the bonds of the same company to the amount of $3,300,000, and both acts were in conflict with the constitution.

At this session, on the recommendation of the governor, an act passed releasing to certain claimants, on a worthless pretext, which could deceive no lawyer, property in the city of Atlanta worth a quarter of a million of dollars. The beneficiaries of this transaction were known as the "Mitchell orphans."

Among the new men of that epoch was H. I. Kimball, who having failed elsewhere to find scope and appreciation for his great gifts, brought them to Georgia in quest of the opportunities which the process of destroying a State and then rebuilding it afforded. His was the genius which undertook the construction of the railroad which has just been mentioned as the donee of so much favor from the General Assembly.

Besides he had other roads in process of construction upon the credit of the State during his primacy, and in addition a grand opera-house and a great hotel in the city of Atlanta. His recourse for the millions required for these enterprises was the credit of the State. The Legislature gave him charters and bonds and indorsed the bonds of his corporations at his pleasure. The State bought his opera-house at a good round price, for a capital. He was paid temporarily for this property in the currency bonds to relieve his urgent wants, and when the gold bonds were engraved and ready for circulation, his friend, the governor, gave him of these $250,000 with the understanding that currency bonds to that amount should be returned. The latter bonds he neglected to restore. He became the financial agent of the State by Bullock's appointment, and hawked the bonds of the State about in New York with remarkable freedom.

In that capacity he went to that city to take up currency bonds which had been hypothecated by Bullock, and substitute the gold bonds. His letter of instruction directed him to cancel and return to the treasury the currency bonds. With one bank he made the substitution as directed, but instead of canceling and returning to the treasury the currency bonds received of the bank, he applied $170,000 of them to his own private use as collaterals for loans. He deposited gold bonds to a large amount with other bankers who had currency bonds, but did not require the surrender of the latter before he gave up the gold bonds, and so two sets of bonds were held for the same liability.

Some of these bankers were his own financial associates. He had received the State's indorsement of $275,000 of bonds of a railroad company (other than that hitherto mentioned), and for some reason, having had an act passed changing the name of the company, he received the indorsement of the State on the bonds of the road under the new name amounting to $330,000, upon the promise that he would use them to extinguish the first issue. The promise was not fulfilled, and the new bonds of the road went upon the market as additional obligations of the road and of the State.

When Bullock became governor the State owned a railroad running from Atlanta to Chattanooga, which connected all the railroad systems of the State with the West. It was wrecked by General Sherman during the latter part of the war, but it had, under the administration of Governor Jenkins and at great cost, been put in excellent condition. It easily earned a net revenue for the State of three or four hundred thousand dollars a year. It paid into the treasury $25,000 per month during 1869, under an appointee of Governor Bullock (Colonel Hurlbut), with all the embezzlements which that appointment involved.

But Colonel Hurlbut was not satisfactory to the governor, and in defiance of warnings as to the character of Foster Blodget, the latter was appointed superintendent. The new superintendent of the road entered upon his duties on the 1st day of January, 1870. For the year 1869 Hurlbut expended in operating the road, $985,633.80. During the year 1870 Blodget's expenditures aggregated $2,043,293.87. He left the road in bad condition and a debt of over half a million, which the State had to pay out of the treasury. Not less than $1,000,000 was lost by the change of superintendents.

Under a provision of the constitution a poll-tax of $1 was levied for educational purposes. The fund created by this tax amounted in 1870 to $268,000. In 1870 it was used to compensate members of the General Assembly, and such teachers as were employed in the public schools of that year went without compensation. The children attending schools during the year 1870 were 67,142 white and 10,351 colored, aggregating 77,493. For the sake of comparison it may be here stated that there were actually enrolled in the public schools of the State in 1888, of white children 200,786 and colored children 120,390, aggregating 321,176.

In 1868, when Governor Bullock was installed, the debt of the State was $5,827,000. At the end of his administration the treasurer reported the debt to be $12,450,000, and indorsed bonds in addition $5,733,000, aggregating $18,183,000, and the bonds of the State were no longer marketable, except at very ruinous rates. Now the bonds of the State bearing 4½ per cent. are worth in the market a premium of 20 per cent.

Since 1870 the State road has paid into the treasury $25,000 every month, or six millions in twenty years.

The governor during his term of three years pardoned three hundred and forty-six offenders against the law. Some of these offenders received pardons before trial. He granted seven pardons in advance of trial to one man, who pleaded then to seven separate indictments. These acts of the executive did not tend to inspire confidence in the law nor promote the administration of justice in the courts. The taxable property of the State in 1860 amounted to $672,322,777, in 1870 to $226,326,769, and in 1880 to $345,000,000, exclusive of railroad property.

Prosperity such as this rapid and steady increase of wealth implies is fair evidence that good government has followed the expiration of Governor Bullock's term; and the commerce of the State, freed from the apprehension of misgovernment, it is confidently believed, is twice as great as before the war.

On the 3d of October, 1870, Bullock approved an act entitled "An act to provide for an election, and to alter and amend the laws in relation to holding the elections."

It was drawn with great care. It provided that an election for members of the General Assembly, members of Congress, and county officers should be held on the 20th, 21st, and 22d days of December thereafter. The continuance of the election for three days, without any registration of voters, gave great facility to repeating. One colored man is known to have voted thirteen times at this election by the mere device of changing his hat and his name each time.

The law further provided that the election should be held only at the courthouse of each county or in an incorporated city or town by five managers, three of whom were to be nominated by the governor, two by the ordinary of the county, and all of them were to be confirmed by the senate. In those counties in which the ordinaries were of the governor's party (and such was the case in nearly half of the counties) all the managers were selected by the same party influence. The act further provided that the managers should have no power to refuse ballots of male persons of "apparent full age" resident in the county who had not previously voted, and it prohibited all challenges. It was stuffed with pains and penalties.

The political campaign that ensued was memorable. It was not a race between two parties either of which would have administered public affairs with honesty and justice in all departments. On the part of the Democrats it was a struggle for good government. It was a situation in which all good citizens banded themselves together against profligacy and corruption and a disgraceful administration. On the other hand, the negroes were told by their leaders that their defeat involved the loss of their political privileges and even of their personal freedom. It was a contest for supremacy between those who had always been masters and those who had been their slaves. It was a trial in which if one side succeeded there would be an honest administration for all, and if the other succeeded there would be ruin for all. The instinct of caste also intensified the efforts of both parties.

In Georgia the issue of such a struggle could not be doubtful. The victory was overwhelming. Not a disorder occurred, and Bullock's own managers counted the votes. Such rejoicing was never known before in Georgia. The Christmas-tide had brought a new redemption.

Before the deputies of an indignant people could meet and confront him Bullock had resigned his office and fled the State.

And it may be truthfully said that reconstruction accomplished not one useful result, and left behind it not one pleasant recollection.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. BUTTERWORTH, Mr. CANNON, and Mr. FORNEY as conferees on the legislative appropriation bill.

FEDERAL ELECTION LAW.

[Mr. WADDILL withholds his remarks for revision. See Appendix.]

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Speaker, the bill now under consideration proposes to provide for the more efficient enforcement of the election laws of the United States.

Section 16 is as follows:

Sec. 16. Upon the receipt by the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the declaration and certificate of any United States board of canvassers of the Congressional vote as to the election of any Representative or Delegate in Congress it shall be the duty of that officer to open and file the same in his office. If by such declaration and certificate it shall appear that another and different person has been elected as a Representative or Delegate in Congress than the person certified as elected by such officer or officers of the State in which such Congressional district is situated, whose duty it is by the laws of the State to make such certificate, then the person so certified as elected by the declaration and certificate of the United States board of canvassers shall be, by the said Clerk of the House of Representatives, placed upon the rolls of persons elected as Representatives or Delegates in Congress, and the provisions of existing law respecting the names of persons who shall be placed upon the roll of the House of Representatives by the Clerk thereof are modified to the extent herein provided, and to such extent only. Any Clerk of the House of Representatives who shall neglect, fail, or refuse to place upon the roll of Representatives and Delegates elect the name of any person entitled to be placed thereon as provided by the laws of the United States shall be liable to arrest, and upon conviction of such neglect, failure, or refusal shall be punished by a fine not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, or by imprisonment for not less than one nor more than five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, and shall be forever disqualified from holding thereafter any office of trust or profit under the Government of the United States.

I have selected this particular portion of the act for criticism because I believe that it is so objectionable and is so dangerous to the peace and welfare of our country that especial attention should be called to it and that no patriotic man should vote for it.

No effort to create an impression that the object is to have honest elections, no attempt to make the bill appear respectable by connecting with it the hitherto honored name of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], will ever succeed in hiding from the public that a plan is being prepared to continue the Republican party in power in the Fifty-second Congress in case the people in the elections decide otherwise.

I do not find in conversing with our colleagues that there are many enthusiastic advocates of the measure on the side of the majority; indeed, there appears to exist a feeling of regret that such legislation has been decided upon. Members understand that while the enactment of this new law may insure the control of the next House to the present majority and continue in their positions the officers now in possession, there is danger that some day it may be utilized to the detriment of their party.

Do the gentlemen who have reported this bill realize that they have placed the Speaker of this House in the attitude of aiding them in the passage of an act which the public believes is calculated to benefit him more than any living being, and that their course may, if this bill become a law, force the Speaker to make public announcement that he can not under such circumstances be again a candidate for the Speakership? Or do these gentlemen believe that they avoid such a danger by providing in the bill that our good-natured Clerk shall go to prison and pay a fine in case he is tempted to accept the certificates forwarded to him by State officers instead of those sent him by the supervisors appointed by direction of the chairman of the national Republican committee?

What better evidence could there be of the sufficiency of present laws relating to Federal elections than the existence to-day of this Republican House of Representatives? We know that in 1888 the Democrats were in power and that the Clerk of this House was of that party. Would it have been safe then to put in the hands of hundreds of small officials the power and temptation of compelling that Clerk to make up a roll with Democrats in the majority? Is it not evident that State officers are composed generally of men who can not afford to commit open frauds, and will the same sense of responsibility be found everywhere among these supervisors? God grant that this bill may not become a law.

The people of this country will submit to much abuse to avoid turmoil, but can it be expected that the representatives of the people will remain quietly at their homes and permit defeated opponents to usurp their places? No, Mr. Speaker, this will not be. After the elections have been held it will be known through the proper authorities of the various States who are the successful candidates. All elected from North, South, East, and West will come to Washington, and you can rest assured that the legally elected House of Representatives will not give way to a rump Congress, but in a constitutional manner will assert its rights and be organized.

I have alluded to the lack of interest in this bill exhibited by many Republican members; permit me to ask where can we find any enthusiasm for it. In the State of New York, where is its support from the press? I find in the home of my friend, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BELDEN], his own organ, the ably edited Syracuse Standard, says:

It strikes us quite forcibly that the other Republicans in Congress had better cut loose from Mr. LODGE's election bill. We have previously said that it appears unconstitutional, and, on the ground of the opinion that the enforcement of the proposed law would be intrusted to local action, we have said that the scheme would be inoperative. Perhaps, however, its operation can be insured in most election districts by scrupulous choice of the Federal instruments; but the more careful the Government may be in selecting inspectors not amenable to the public opinion about them, the more odious the law will become, and the more determined will be the efforts for its defeat.

There arises a possibility which must make the Lodge bill unpopular. Its principles can be brought into play for the regulation of elections in the North. Upon the demand of a limited number of electors in any district Federal inspectors must be appointed; and the Democrats give notice of an intention to set the law in universal operation. If they refrain from invoking it in Democratic States or sections, they will hardly refrain where the Republicans are in the majority.

Supporters of the bill may declare that the Republican party has nothing to fear from the plan in question; but do they reflect on its working, and on its necessary collision with State law? The supervisors empowered to watch over Congressional and Presidential elections will have the privilege of handling and examining ballots and keeping tally of votes. Without this power they can not indeed supervise elections, but with it, do they not destroy the secrecy of the ballot, which, in several States, the people have been so anxious to obtain, and should be jealous in guarding? If Republican protests against the Lodge bill are not common, it must be because Republican newspapers have not generally considered it, or have not supposed that Congress had any serious thought of embodying it in a statute.

I think my other friend, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], will concede that the ablest Republican paper in his district is the Auburn Advertiser. Here is an extract from it:

The Federal election bill, whose chief promoter is Mr. LODGE, of Massachusetts, is approved by President Harrison and is a scheme to do away with Representatives, which the Constitution provides "shall be apportioned among the several States," and creates a new kind of Representative by Federal authority. The bill as it stands antagonizes ballot reform in every point. But perhaps the most extraordinary provision is that when the Federal supervisors of the election differ from the State authorities as to which candidate has been elected to Congress the Clerk of the House shall put upon the roll the name returned by the Federal supervisors and reject the name returned by the State authorities. The bill does not commend itself upon present acquaintance with it.

Still another of my esteemed friends, the gentleman from New York

[Mr. LANSING], has an influential Republican paper in his district. I quote from it:

Even if it should become a law it is doubtful if it would be of much effect, because it would have public sentiment against it in the section where it is intended to correct an evil, and would have no enthusiastic backing in the North, where it is not needed. In fact, while it is not a national measure, to act with equal force everywhere, it will really be sectional in its operation. In applying it to correct evils in the South, it would appear to open the door to evils in the North. The provisions of the bill, for instance, could not operate in full under the new ballot system provided for this State. One or the other, the State law or the national law, would have to be modified in some particulars. There would be a clashing of authority. The Federal election law is all based on conditions in the Southern States which do not exist in other States. Should they pass ballot-reform laws, such as have been adopted in some States, Federal control would render those laws difficult of execution.—Watertown Times (Republican).

The great majority of the Republican papers are silent, but I doubt not as they learn more of the bill they will be troubled in determining how to defend it. There is no denying the fact that for some years past in portions of the United States the practice of purchasing votes has been a shocking and increasing evil. In New York State an earnest effort has been made for ballot reform, looking to a doing away with corrupt practices at the polls. This laudable, patriotic movement was long resisted by powerful men and organizations; but the people clamored for the passage of a law and finally the opposition realized that those obstructing the principle would be swept aside, and so they surrendered and a new ballot law went into effect.

It has been expected that an era of decent elections would commence in our State next November, but now we see rising before us the shadow of this accursed bill, as it comes grasping for continuous power here, and crippling on its way our new-born child, "ballot reform." Perchance this may be no accidental injury, but an adroit side movement of the Fouché-like New Yorker, who has allowed the gentleman from Massachusetts to father this bill.

The vital feature of our New York law is the preservation of secrecy of the ballot. The bill under consideration (page 59, lines 28-30) makes it the duty of Federal officials to accompany the voter into the secret booth where he can see him prepare his ballot.

The New York law, section 18, provides that—

Any person who declares under oath that he is physically unable to prepare his ballot can bring with him "a person of his own selection" to assist him, and that person is forbidden to reveal the contents of voter's ballot.

In this bill a Federal supervisor is thrust on this privacy. While the New York law was being framed so serious was the contention for preserving rights of the individual that they abandoned a plan to have even inspector of election or ballot clerk aid the voter. That law is based on the inherent right of the voter and was fortified by opinions of able jurists.

Judge Cooley says in Constitutional Limitations, page 762:

Public policy requires that the veil of secrecy should be impenetrable; unless the voter himself voluntarily determines to lift it, his ballot is absolutely privileged.

And Judge McCrary, in his work on Elections, section 453, says:

The chief reason for the general adoption of the ballot in this country is that it affords the voter the means of preserving the secrecy of his vote, thus enabling him to vote independently and freely, without being subject to be overawed, intimidated, or in any manner controlled by others, and protects him from any ill-will or persecution on account of his vote. The secret ballot is justly regarded as an important and valuable safeguard for the protection of the voter, and particularly the humble citizen against the influence which wealth and station may be supposed to exercise.

Judge Denio, one of New York's traditionally great judges, wrote (27 New York, 25):

This object [the secrecy of the ballot] would be accomplished but very imperfectly if the privacy supposed to be secured was limited to the moment of casting his ballot.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] claims he does not disturb the Australian system; but I say his bill would be no worse than it is if he required in New York that his Federal supervisor should stand at the ballot-box of every poll and demand that every helpless voter, whom New York's new law has carefully guarded, should open his ballot and disclose its contents under penalty of section 52.

In New York, and I believe also in Massachusetts, the ballot law provides that all officers shall be voted for on one ballot, and there shall be but one box. This bill repeatedly refers to Congressional box and Congressional ballot. Does this mean that a separate ballot must be cast for member of Congress? In that case New York law will be confused at its first trial by repealing section 17, which provides:

There shall be but one ballot-box at each polling place for receiving all ballots cast for candidates for office.

It is not surprising, Mr. Speaker, that the people of New York should be irritated by having any interference with their new law. All through the State voters are studying details of the State law to make it operate successfully, and now they see a prospect of an important feature being changed and the expense of duplicating official ballots amounting, it is estimated, to 40,000,000 in number for the State.

If it is claimed by the committee that this bill does not call for a separate Congressional ballot and box the case is all the more serious, for it makes the United States officials not merely canvassers of the ballots for State, assembly, county, municipal, and ward offices, but enables them to judge of the qualification of voters for those offices.

Expense would not be a great consideration if this bill were necessary. But, in addition to its uselessness and vicious principles, it is very expensive. The burden will fall on citizens of a locality just as heavily if money is taken from citizens through Federal taxes as though local taxes were imposed. Up to this year the city of Albany, where I reside, has had to pay about $5,000 a year for the public expenses of election. Mayor Manning in his message estimates that public expenses of an election under the new Australian system will be about $20,000, an increase of $15,000. The bill proposes to duplicate that expense in one item alone.

The Albany Argus has the following on this subject:

And this bill, if enacted, will be applied throughout New York State. There need be no mistake on that point. In the city of Albany, for example, there will probably be about ninety election districts under the new State law. The Lodge-Rowell bill creates three Federal supervisors for each district, or two hundred and seventy for the city, and each of these is to receive $60 for his services. To get this total of $16,200 out of the Federal Treasury for Albany alone, does any one suppose it will be difficult to get up a petition with one hundred names here? Yet that is all that is required, and with the needed change in figures the same is true of every city and county in New York State. The Lodge-Rowell bill as a measure to oppress the Democrats of the South seems an amusing matter to certain Republicans in the State. We invite their attention to the way it will work in New York.

This includes only amount for Federal supervisors. In addition to that, pay of unlimited deputy marshals at $5 per day, and other expenses must be met.

Mr. Speaker, the bill permits a ridiculously small number of voters to invoke this great and expensive Federal machinery in New York, duplicating all the State machinery. Fifty or one hundred persons claiming to be voters can call it into operation in any district. What a contrast this is to the New York idea. There, in the simple matter of making an independent nomination for Congress, involving only the expense of printing the ballots, the law wisely requires that at least two hundred and fifty citizens must sign a petition of nomination, each with his residence and fact of being a voter legally attested to by an officer authorized to take acknowledgments.

The chairman of the committee [Mr. LODGE] in his speech said:

The great safeguard to the public welfare of this country is publicity. The business of the people must not be transacted in dim corners or in locked rooms, but openly before the people's eyes, etc.

That sounds well, and leads us to believe the Speaker's room will be unlocked hereafter when the "leaders" meet to prepare an order of business; and as the gentleman feels this way possibly he will amend his bill in its most dangerous feature, namely, its failure to provide for immediate publicity of Federal supervisors' returns. If Federal returns are to overrule State and local returns, this immediate publicity is of the utmost consequence.

The New York law provides:

First. The original statements, duly certified, shall be delivered by the inspectors, or by one of them to be deputed for that purpose, to the supervisor of the town or ward within twenty-four hours after the same shall have been subscribed. (Section 305 of State Election Code, page 117, edition of 1885.)

And also provides:

A true copy of the several statements made by the inspectors shall be made and certified by them and immediately filed by them in the office of the clerk of the town or city. (Section 302, same page.)

These returns become immediately a matter of public record. To these provisions of law is due the fact that the narrow Democratic majority of 1,047 for Cleveland in 1884, in a total vote of 1,300,000, was recognized by every one as absolutely fair. It was possible within twenty-four hours after election by telegraphing to various county clerks to verify the vote of every county and election district, with the check of duplicate return.

In this bill there is no provision for publicity, nothing but oral statements to be made, until the United States board of canvassers meet. The chief supervisor should be at least required to hold his returns open to immediate public inspection, although it seems even this would not be conclusive of the result, and we can know only after the board meets what candidate is entitled to the certificate.

Thus the returns which actually determine an election to Congress, upon which the certificate is based, are not in New York made known in total or in part until November 15.

Under present New York State law, within twenty-four or thirty-six hours at utmost the result of a Congressional election can be determined by comparison of returns in the hands of supervisor and in hands of the town clerk. Under this bill the returns which really decide are not even opened until November 15; the chief supervisor's duplicates from which a guess might be made are not in specific terms rendered subject to public inspection.

Opportunities for fraud here are obvious, if Federal supervisors or Federal canvassing boards be so disposed.

But, even if no fraud is contemplated, in close districts immediate publicity of Federal returns is a necessity to prevent temptation being offered later on. As fond as is the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] of the sunlight, his method of publishing Federal returns is darkness compared to the sunlight of the New York State law, which stood the severest possible test in 1884.

Mr. Speaker, this bill should not pass. It is a vicious measure which will cause injustice to be done and will engender bitter feelings. It will serve no useful purpose and will conflict with the ballot laws of

New York, New Jersey, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Massachusetts, and Indiana. In all these States efforts are being made to stop the use of money in elections; this bill not only interferes with this but takes from the national Treasury and from the people millions of dollars every two years for no other purpose than to help elect members in close districts and to continue in position officers of the House.

Members who fear to vote for increased salaries and for appropriations for clerks, etc., will not appear well before their constituents after voting for this bill.

I prepared some amendments a few days ago and asked to have them printed in the RECORD, but the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] objected. I now print them with my remarks. They are taken from New York State laws, and would improve the bill somewhat, although nothing can make it anything but an outrage on a free people while it includes section 16.

First amendment: On page 3, amend section 2, line 30; after the word "residence" add: "And shall, before an officer duly authorized to take acknowledgments, acknowledge his signature, and make oath that he is a voter and has truly stated his residence. No person shall sign more than one application for such supervisor."

This amendment will tend to force the men who are circulating petitions for the purpose of making offices for themselves to secure responsible citizens, and, as I before remarked, is in accord with the New York ballot-reform law.

Second amendment: On page 5, section 4, strike out all after word "the" in line 2 to word "in," line 4, and insert the following: "Election district."

I offer this, Mr. Speaker, because if supervisors are to have power to overrule inspectors they ought at least to be in a position from personal knowledge to pass on voters the same as inspectors are. We are very tenacious of the rights of localities in New York State, and great offense will be given if supervisors from a distance are put in charge of a polling-place. Both great parties will view this alike.

Third amendment: On page 7, section 5, line 26, after word "persons," insert the following: "Who shall be qualified voters in the election district to which they are assigned."

Fourth amendment: On page 8, section 6, in line 14, strike out all after word "elections" down to word "may," in line 20.

These amendments marked 3 and 4 necessarily follow second amendment.

Fifth amendment: On page 15, sections 8 and 11, insert at end of line 143 the following: "The first day of registration in places where there shall be registration, and in places where there is no registration, the."

Unless the bill is designed to aid fraud, this amendment should be adopted. In New York the constitution fixes thirty days as the period of residence in a district, and a canvass before that is worthless, and could only be taken to promote unjust challenge. Without this amendment the Federal machinery in New York commences its operations four days before the State machinery in the cities. In towns it will be even worse, as the registry begins only sixteen days before election. For what purpose should the Federal supervisors make a house-to-house canvass nineteen days before the registry is begun, unless it is to serve the ends of the Republican campaign committee?

Sixth amendment: On page 53, section 36, add to the section the following: "It shall not be lawful for any employer in paying his employes the salary or wages due them to inclose their pay in 'pay envelopes' upon which there are written or printed any political mottoes, devices, or arguments containing threats, express or implied, intended or calculated to influence the political opinions or actions of such employes; nor shall it be lawful for any employer within ninety days of an election at which a member of Congress is to be voted for to put or otherwise exhibit in his factory, workshop, or other establishment or place where his employes may be working any handbill or placard containing any threat, notice, or information that in case any particular ticket or candidate shall be elected work in his place or establishment will cease, in whole or in part, or his establishment will be closed up, or the wages of his workmen be reduced, or other threats, express or implied, intended or calculated to influence the political opinion or action of his employes."

This amendment marked 6 I propose, Mr. Speaker, because it is a part of the New York State law, and is designed to prevent the intimidation of voters. It should meet the approval of the gentleman who has reported the bill.

Seventh amendment: After section 50, page 69, insert a new section, as follows, and renumber sections to correspond:

"Sec. 51. Every candidate for member of Congress shall within ten days after the election file as hereinafter provided an itemized statement, showing in detail all the moneys contributed by or for him directly or indirectly by himself or through or by any other person in aid of his election. Such statement shall give the names of the various persons who received such moneys, the specific nature of each item, and the purpose for which it was expended or contributed. There shall be attached to such statement an affidavit, subscribed and sworn to by such candidate, setting forth in substance that the statement thus made is in all respects true, and that the same is a full and detailed statement of all money so contributed or expended by him, directly or indirectly, by himself or through any other person, in aid of his election. Such sworn statement shall be filed in the office of the secretary of state of the State of which the district of the said candidate for member of Congress shall be the whole or a part, and shall also be filed with the United States board of canvassers heretofore in this act provided for, and no certificate of election or return of the vote shall be issued by said board under provisions of this act until said sworn statement shall have been filed with them and published in two daily newspapers of different political parties printed in the State designated by them for the purpose."

The amendment marked 7 is also in accordance with the law of New York State, and is to prevent large expenditures of money by candidates and to check the purchase of voters. It can properly be embodied in this bill.

Mr. Speaker, a rumor is in the air that an ingenious substitute may be sprung upon the House in place of this bill. I warn members of the other side not to be misled to believe that it will be less objectionable than this act.

Mr. Speaker, it is almost incredible that the House of Representatives of the United States can be disgraced by the passage of such a measure. But if, influenced more, I trust, by the power of the party lash than by an ignoble greed for a continuance of the places and emoluments you now enjoy, you determine, gentlemen of the majority, to force this bill through the House, we will join issue with you before the American people. I do not doubt their verdict will be an emphatic condemnation of those who support this effort to prevent the properly-elected Representatives securing seats in this House.

I reserve the balance of my time and yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has two minutes remaining.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I would prefer to take the two minutes after the next gentleman on the other side of the House, if it is agreeable.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can be recognized for twelve minutes.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. At this time, or after the next speaker on the other side?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can be recognized now.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, when the rules of the House were under discussion a prominent member upon the other side of the House assured us that there would remain to us the privileges of debate and amendment. We have had one example of the extent to which that poor privilege was permitted us in the consideration of one of the most important political measures that has ever been considered in this House, to wit, the McKinley tariff bill. We were permitted the mere sham of an opportunity to amend that bill. We were permitted to talk for a limited period of time only, and very little opportunity was given either gentlemen upon this side of the House or upon the other to offer any substantial amendments to that bill and to have them voted upon. I apprehend that there is danger that in the two days allotted to us for amendment and discussion of the pending bill under the five-minute rule we may be treated to the same sham as we were treated to then. But before I proceed I feel it my duty, as the representative of nearly 200,000 citizens of the United States, to thank the parliamentary potentate of this House for the poor privilege of spending twelve minutes in the discussion of a bill which it would take any careful man one hour to read so as to understand it. Twelve minutes to be spent in discussing a bill that is calculated to overturn or sweep aside the laws and customs and the usages of this country for one hundred years; a bill that is to create a horde of new officers with inquisitorial powers and almost absolute authority; a bill which is intended to provide a corruption fund of millions of dollars for one of the political parties of this country; a bill which is intended to create a partisan machinery to place in the hands of the bosses of that party the opportunity to nominate or designate who shall be nominated as the candidate of the Republican party in the next Presidential campaign. One of the results of this measure, which is as absolute as any other that may follow from it, is the construction, I say, of a political machine to control within that party the delegation of the entire South in the next Republican national convention. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], on Saturday, in insisting that he should not be interrupted in his discussion of this bill, himself a member of the committee that framed the bill, said that he felt he ought to have at least four or five hours instead of one hour in which to discuss it; yet he, coming from that committee, was one of the magnanimous men that gave to one hundred and fifty of us upon this side of the House to debate the bill but three times as many hours as he thought he ought to have to discuss it himself.

Ten minutes for each member upon this side is all we are permitted to have in which to discuss a measure as revolutionary as this is; and I use the term "revolutionary" in its most odious sense. The gentleman from Iowa, in offering some reasons for the introduction of a measure of this kind at this time, cited the fact that there were seventeen contested-election cases pending, or which had been pending, before this House at great expense, at least $70,000. Who instigated many of those contested-election cases? Who set them afoot? Who furnished the funds to carry them on? Was it not the national executive committee of the Republican party? Did not politicians of that party outside of the districts contested supply the testimony in some instances—I had almost said had supplied the perjury? Why are some of these cases here? For perhaps the very purpose of citing them as the necessity for some such legislation as this election bill. Let me read to this House the view taken by a member of the Committee on Elections as to the propriety of these seventeen cases being brought here. I read from the remarks of Mr. GREENHALGE:

Why, sir, after the most careful scrutiny, after a delay which I should think would convince any fair-minded man that this matter does not proceed with undue heat or partisan haste, we have not seated half the contestants who have come before that committee, and the fact that members have been left in their seats is because upon our conscientious view of the evidence in their cases we were unable to come to a conclusion, when, if we acted from partisan feeling, if all we required was a partisan majority, it would have been just as easy to seat A as to seat B, the whole seventeen contestants as five or six; that fact, I think, entitles me to resent these insinuations upon the honor and the conscience of this most responsible and honorable committee.

I cite this to show to the House and to the country that this gentleman himself is bound to confess, and does virtually admit, that not one-half of these cases were well founded. This is from a gentleman who in doing what he seemed to think was his duty upon that committee, has voted to overturn elections in the South that were as fairly conducted, as purely and as properly conducted under the law as the elections conducted in his own State. A little further on he spoke of the remarks made by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. EWART], who in a broad, conservative, and statesmanlike way showed the condition of the South, its prosperity, the success of the Republican party in his State upon principle, presenting a general view of the condition of affairs in the South that would give the falsehood to many of the charges and assertions made upon the floor of this House, as a reason why there should be no intermeddling with its domestic affairs such as this bill makes.

The gentleman from Massachusetts rises up and says: "You give a local view merely. You are satisfied that things are all right in your district. I am from Massachusetts, and I cast my eye over this whole country and say it is necessary to supervise these elections and control them."

Gentlemen of the House, this bill is intended, not to have fair elections, but to prevent any elections being held by the people in several districts in this country. This bill is calculated to make it possible for twice as many contested-election cases in the next House as there are in this. Any one who will study the provisions of this bill will see that in its complicated, in its intricate, and in its remarkable machinery it is calculated to prevent the common people of this land from conducting their own elections.

I have studied its provisions as carefully as I could in the brief time that has been allowed, and have attempted to unravel the duties of election officers and to follow them through and see what they must do in order to provide us with a pure election. The result has been to find myself amid such confusion and intricacy of duties and of requirements that it would be impossible for an ordinary election officer to understand and apply them. Not ten members on the floor of this House would agree upon the conduct of an election under it.

In my region when anything is difficult to understand or to unravel, we say it would take a Philadelphia lawyer to unravel it. As I read this bill I said that it would take some one to understand its complicated and bungling terms acuter, shrewder, more cunning, and more intellectual than a Philadelphia lawyer; it would take a Massachusetts scholar in politics.

This bill confers absolute power on the chief supervisor of elections. When Louis Napoleon was president of the French Republic and determined to become its emperor, he had no more control of the vote of the people, no more absolute hold in his hands of the plébiscite than this bill places in the hands of the machine-running power of the Republican party.

Gentlemen upon that side have said if they thought this was a partisan measure they would vote against it. Tell me why this bill gives such absolute power to the chief supervisor of election. He convenes courts; he makes appointments of a multitude of officers; he appoints the supervisors and inspectors; he sends out "discreet" individuals, to go from house to house accompanied by a United States marshal to inquire into the condition of the voter or into his rights. What does this mean? If the bill is not partisan, why do you provide for appointing twice as many Republican supervisors as Democratic supervisors? Why do you arrange for an unlimited number of Republican deputy marshals? Why do you repeal that feature of the Federal jury law which provides for mixed juries and arrange to have juries packed by Republican officials?

[Here the hammer fell.]

FEDERAL ELECTION LAW.

[Mr. HOPKINS withholds his remarks for revision. See Appendix.] The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] is now recognized for ten minutes. [A pause.] Does the gentleman desire to proceed now?

Mr. OATES. I do not at this time. I did not know I was to be recognized now. Later on I should be glad to address the House.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Mr. Speaker, it is doubtful whether the present discussion is a practical one. We have a bill under consideration it is true, but we may at the last minute have a substitute thrust upon us more hostile to free institutions in all its provisions than this is.

The majority have reserved the right to do that. They cling to the policy of making every measure an ambush, every report of the Committee on Rules a surprise. I do not know—no man save one close to the throne knows—what is in store for us, what new mine may be sprung under the liberties of the people.

Sir, the bill before us, the subject of that bill, certainly ought to be discussed in the spirit of the purest patriotism. It ought not to be approached in a partisan spirit. The institutions of our country are not a fetich from which to threaten or cajole selfish rewards for ourselves and bad fortune for our political opponents.

There are certain grounds of political action which ought to be common to all the people. The elements of popular rights, like the elements of the christian religion, should bear the same meaning to all men. Where those rights are concerned, there should be but one creed.

It is as clear as sunlight that no party is true to liberty who seek to trench themselves in power by seizing the machinery through which the will of the people is expressed. No party actuated by honest motives will ever attempt to do that. No man who has either the pride of intellect or the virtue of patriotism will dare go into history as the inventor or the aider of so great an infamy. No one on the floor here to-day will gainsay this.

Yet, sir, a great change is proposed in our institutions. I will not call it revolutionary, because that word, applied to an honest cause, has no terrors for Americans. Fanatics and knaves alike use it as a shibboleth of their faith or a halo to their villainy. But, sir, it is a great change, a departure from the old ways and the tried ways of the Republic. It is a bold step towards consolidation. It is consolidation, centralization in its most positive form. It is the end of popular government. It is the final authoritative utterance of the doctrine that the people are unfit to govern themselves in the old-fashioned way, through their local officers; that the township and county authorities, the executives and Legislatures of States shall be curbed and bitted and ridden by the irresponsible appointees of the most despotic and irresponsible officers of the Government. It is a proclamation of imperialism.

Why, sir, if these returning boards and supervisors derived their power from some source near the people and in which they have confidence, we might tolerate them, because the power to make would be the power to unmake. But, sir, how will you reach the judges? Who can check a judicial officer whom the law authorizes to be a politician and whose party demands that he shall be a partisan? Sir, there are but two despotisms in the country to-day, the Speakership of the House and the Federal judiciary, the first omnipotent because the incumbent is expected ex officio to be the leader of a party and the last because of the power which may lay its hands on every man's person and property and because of the respect which flatters the incumbent and shuts from his ear the just criticism of his conduct. I repeat, sir, how will we control the judges? What guaranty is there in this bill that they will be honest and unpartisan in the exercise of their appointive power?

Sir, a constant temptation is set before them. Visions of political advancement will haunt their waking and sleeping hours. The great political prizes of the country will seem constantly within their reach. Judges have heretofore, without this special, this great power, aspired even to the Presidency of the Republic. They are men like unto other men. You propose to put a great temptation before them.

Sir, the functions conferred on them by this bill are not judicial functions. They are essentially political and essentially partisan. They will drag the judiciary down instead of exalting them. The inclinations of judges in great public crises will be subjects of solicitude, and they will be expected to stand with their party when "emergencies arise."

It is certain that these duties are not judicial. They do not come within any purpose for which courts are instituted or for which we are under the Constitution permitted to institute them. I protest, sir, that the spirit of the Constitution is violated when functions of this executive nature are imposed on the judges. It is a confusion of two distinct departments of the Government, a sharp departure from the theory of the divisions of the powers. But, sir, there is another violation of the Constitution in this bill. The measure it proposes is not meant to apply universally or to be the absolute rule in the conduct of elections. You do not say that in every election district in the United States this machinery shall be set in motion. The voices of fifty or a hundred men, according to the locality, are required to extend the blessing of pure elections to the constituencies.

Why is this? What secret of partisan intrigue is hidden under this provision? Why shall Congress abdicate its power to establish a rule to govern all elections and delegate it to a handful of men here and there through the country? What manner of men are they who may exercise this power of overturning the laws in some of the States, while the laws of other States remain in force?

What monstrous spectacle is this which will keep in force at the same time two different sets of election laws, one for Massachusetts, another for South Carolina? What manner of men, I repeat, are they who may do this great work? Of what moral standard shall they be, of what intelligence, of what patriotism? Will they come from the slums of cities, will they be the mean hangers-on of ambitious leaders? Will they seek pure elections or partisan advantage? Will they be the champions of free representation or the instruments of a party which requires this machinery to retain domination of this House?

But, sir, there is a more serious question. I know that appeals to the Constitution are irksome to some gentlemen on this floor. They believe in "meeting emergencies" when they arise, and the restraints of the Constitution fret their noble spirits. But, sir, that instrument, tried as it has been by the storms of battle, assailed by the lust of money and the lust of power, still stands in the path, the refuge of the people against oppression. It prohibits you to do this thing. By its terms the election laws of all the States are the normal standard, not to be departed from except on the gravest necessity. Its spirit and intent demand that when you act you shall establish a general rule, applicable uniformly to all the country, a rule evolved, not from party exigencies or local hatred, but from the best interests of all the people.

You can not say, and, if you constitutionally can, you ought not to say, that one law shall prevail in one district and another in the next, that a State shall have two different rules of election procedure within its borders, one Federal and the other local, or within the same Congressional district, and that different States may have different regulations. This sporadic kind of legislation renders favoritism to men, to sections, and places easy. It makes the oppression of men, sections, and places easy. It savors too much of taking care of the salvation of the political saints and providing for the damnation of partisan opponents. But, sir, above all, the Constitution prescribes that whatever is done shall be done by Congress, and not by companies of fifties and companies of hundreds; that here, and here only, by your voices, shall a uniform rule be proclaimed which shall prevail in every precinct of every county, in every district, and every State of the Union. You must apply your law everywhere alike.

The rural constituencies of the North must bend under it with the Democratic cities of the North and the people of the South. That is the only law you have power to make, and so far as the present bill fails in this respect it is unconstitutional. You can not delegate your power, nor can you aid this bill by saying that the rule is universal, that the fifties and the hundreds may apply to put it in operation everywhere. The fifties and the hundreds are unknown quantities to the Constitution. The legislative power of this country is not hidden in the vest pockets of a few dissatisfied citizens or of political tools. It is your power, the power of the people speaking through Congress, in the same tones everywhere and imposing a rule which no section is favored to escape and with which no section can be crushed into political death.

Sir, your law is unconstitutional and no man in the House dare make it constitutional by applying it to every part of the country.

I observe, sir, that the author of this bill shrinks from altering the registration laws of the State by establishing a national law in their stead. I wonder at this forbearance. You endeavor to strike out with the dash of a pen the entire election machinery of the State. Why not take the next step of constitutional invasion and add qualification to the right to vote? Why hesitate here? You overturn the State election boards, you give power to appointees of irresponsible judicial officers to override the decisions of inspectors elected by the people. Why do you not complete the work by abolishing the State system of registration? You can never be safe until you do that.

I know that the bill provides for espionage on the registration boards and I suppose that the reports of your supervisors will be relied on as official evidence to justify your returning boards in discarding votes and giving certificates of election over the State boards and the State executive; but why preserve even the form of respecting the standard of qualification set up by the States? You beat down and crush out all their real power, you rob the officers elected by the people of the control given them by the people and confer it on the appointees of a single man. Why do you not complete your usurpation and finish the work of centralizing the Government by prescribing the qualifications which are necessary to registration? I know of but one answer.

You dare not apply such a law to the North. Your town officers and county officers would not tolerate it. You could not say to them that an assertion of their rights is a continuation of the rebellion. They are not handicapped by any prejudice or sectional feeling against them and as free men they will not let you abrogate the free laws they have made for themselves. You will find, too, that you can not subjugate the Democratic cities of the North. They will continue Democratic and the first fruit of the enforcement of this law will be greater majorities against you. I notice, sir, that in this bill you have a special eye on those cities. I notice, too, that you provide for domiciliary visits, and the home of the citizen may be invaded by the men who are empowered to overturn the people's laws.

I notice, too, there is peculiar venom in the bill against the naturalized citizens; that they are treated as suspects and may be dogged by spies and harassed when they try to exercise their right to vote. You have all the machinery to annoy the citizen, to terrify, to cajole, to corrupt him. You have at the public expense political minute-men to keep watch and ward of your partisan fortunes, an army of spies and informers under political leadership encamped at the hearthstones of the people, but, sir, you can not even by this enginery subjugate the people. The tide has turned against your party, and even the mighty brain which directs the gentleman from Massachusetts to father this audacious bill can not stay it.

Sir, normally under the Constitution the power to regulate elections rests with the States. The language is plain:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof, but the Congress may at any time make or alter such regulations except as to the place of choosing Senators.

That was the first thought of the framers. It established the State law in the beginning and that law continues in force now save so far as it has been changed by the Congress. That body has made two regulations, one as to the time and the other as to the manner of holding elections.

I am not disposed to question the power of Congress to act within constitutional limits under this clause. I do question not only the constitutionality, but the wisdom of exercising it in the manner prescribed in this bill. Nothing but an overwhelming necessity can justify a departure from the old method. You essay to take power from the people and to put it into the hands of a Federal appointee. It is a step in the wrong direction. You obliterate the old landmarks of popular rights. You take from the citizen the control of the elections. You force on him a new system, a system opposed to the practices of the people since the adoption of the Constitution.

Sir, this is a very grave thing to do. It is no excuse for it to say that you have the power to do it. The decision of the Supreme Court in Siebold's case and Yarborough's case does not justify you. It has not decided that you may have your fifties and hundreds, your spies and informers, your partisan judges and boards. That tribunal has not decided what you must, but what you may do. There is not an unoccupied field to fill. The State laws cover the entire ground, and the Constitution prescribes that they shall govern until you act. There is no question as to their constitutionality. Why, then, do you act? Is it in the wantonness of power? Are you obliged to exercise all the power the Constitution gives you? Is it a partisan advantage you expect to gain? Is there any man here who dares to avow that? What is your purpose? What is the necessity which evokes this exercise of your discretion?

There are persons at the South, you say, who are deprived of their rights as electors. Suppose that is true. Is that an excuse? Can you for that reason impose upon the whole country your law of fifties and of hundreds and take from all the people their precious power of local control of elections? Can this justify your establishing a rule which, in the end, will be hurtful to the liberty of the very citizens whose wrongs you are attempting to redress? I repeat, sir, this bill means centralization of all power in the Federal Government, because it strips the people of their only security that they shall have fair representation in this House. Is centralization good for any citizen? Will it bless the black man while it curses the white man? Can you do anything by this kind of legislation save to relight the fires of race prejudice?

Those fires now are burning low, and only yesterday seemed to be dying out, but you propose again to thrust the race question into political prominence and to make the negro the pawn on the board of your party necessities. Is this well for him? Will it raise him in either the social or political scale to keep him constantly the bone of contention between party strifes? What, too, let me ask, is to be gained by your proposed treatment of naturalized citizens? Under the law of the land they are part of us, bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh, as much members of the national family as we are. Why treat them as objects of suspicion? Have they not been brave in war and law-abiding in peace? Have not their brain and brawn been as beneficent to the country as your brain and brawn? Why shall spies and eavesdroppers hang at their heels? Why shall the unclean progeny of your bill fatten on them and watch them as if they are dangerous to the public welfare?

Sir, if there is need of Congressional interference to purify elections, you begin at the wrong place. The great power of corruption to-day is money—the immense sums which control conventions and so poison the elective franchise at its fountain-head—money contributed for the mysterious purposes known as “campaign expenses” and rewarded by the great and small offices of the Government. That is the imminent evil, that is the power that debauches, which reaches to high places, and which is certain to reach your returning boards and to fill the House with its minions. Why not pronounce it a felony to contribute immense sums to defray “campaign expenses?” Why not tell the truth and declare the man who uses his purse to elevate himself to office or to gain a partisan advantage an enemy of the people and a traitor to free institutions?

Here, sir, is a fertile field for the rigor of virtue, for the zeal of reform. The plutocrat is the foe of popular rights, the champion of centralization. His interests are not the interests of the people, his ways are not their ways. He demands new ways; the ways of Federal life appointees dominating the old ways of elected election officers; the ways of one-man power armed to overthrow popular rights; the ways of monopoly, of class legislation, of money despotism. If you are patriots, if you burn with zeal to bless your country, strike at him. Make his chief political virtue, the expenditure of money to influence elections, the greatest of civic crimes.

Sir, we do not need this proposed law. The people know we do not need it. Every honest town officer, every inspector of an election precinct in the country knows that we do not need it. Our States are all prosperous. Content sits at every hearthstone. There is no demand from the people for your fifties or hundreds, your life-long supervisors, your hosts of spies and informers, your political judges, your despotic returning boards. The ways of our fathers have been the ways of prosperity and freedom to us. We will not bow down to your strange gods. We will cling to the true faith of local control of our ballots and of our rights.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MCADOO. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CHIPMAN] be allowed three minutes longer, to come out of the time belonging to this side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan). The Chair understands that the time of that side of the House is exhausted.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to discuss the race problem. In my judgment it has no legitimate place in this controversy. The bill now under consideration does not propose to confer the right to vote on any citizen of the Republic not now possessing that right. It does not propose to take from any citizen of the Republic now having the right to vote that privilege. I am apprehensive this discussion of the race issue is brought in to serve another purpose, to raise a false issue, arouse passions that ought to sleep, and to create prejudices that ought to pass away.

I fear the race question is sometimes raised by those who pretend to deprecate it for the very purpose of inflaming the public mind and warping the individual judgment.

Judge Jackson, late a Senator of the United States—now a judge of one of the Federal courts—in recently charging a jury, found it necessary to caution them not to permit their attention to be drawn aside from the points at issue by efforts of counsel to raise race prejudice. He said:

The counsel for the defendants have sought to impress upon you that some great and vital question other than the guilt or innocence of the defendants on trial is involved in this suit. This is a mistake, gentlemen of the jury. In the trial and proper disposition of this case upon the evidence, the court nor the jury have anything to do with the race problem or with the question of suffrage. The colored man has been regularly invested with the right of suffrage. The constitution of this State confers the right to vote without restriction upon all male citizens twenty-one years of age who have resided twelve months in the State and six months in the county in which the right of suffrage is exercised. The colored man has the benefit of this constitutional provision; and when he has resided in the State and the county the required period he has the same right before the law to cast his vote and have it properly counted that you and I have. This trial in no way involves the consideration of the policy or impolicy of conferring this high privilege upon the colored population.

That is the language of a Democratic judge in a Federal court. So in this controversy the propriety of conferring the right of suffrage on the black race is in no way involved. The simple question is whether those upon whom the right has been conferred shall be permitted to exercise it in this free Government. But, I repeat, the race issue is sometimes raised for ulterior purposes; and I fear the Democratic party, even in that section where the race conflict is so much deplored, deliberately and wickedly force it for the very purpose of overthrowing popular government and subverting the public will.

Why do I say this? In 1879, under the leadership of Wise, Cameron, and other distinguished leaders in Virginia, sustained by the co-operation of 33,000 white people, the Readjuster party was organized on a platform declaring “for a free ballot and a fair count, an honest payment of the debt, and the abolition of the whipping-post.”

It submitted that issue to the people of Virginia; and a Legislature was elected which made choice of a Republican United States Senator. In 1881 the Republican Readjuster party again carried the Legislature and another Republican Senator was chosen to the United States Senate. In 1882 the Readjuster party was again successful in the State, carrying the executive and the judiciary and six members of Congress out of ten. With the Legislature, executive, judiciary, two Senators, and six out of ten members of Congress Republican, it looked to the Democracy of that State as if the “solid South” was about to be broken and Virginia was to lead the van. What was to be done to regain the State and restore it to Bourbon rule? Would it do to raise the race issue in a State where the whites outnumbered the blacks two to one? One would think not; yet it was raised, and, as I will show, raised by the Democratic party, and for no other purpose than to inflame the passions and prejudices of the people and under its sway subvert popular government.

In 1883 another election was to be held, and the Democratic party called its convention at Lynchburgh, to nominate a State ticket and adopt a platform. It will be seen that the most serious controversy in the convention was whether the race issue should be raised.

Let me call attention to what the Richmond Dispatch, the leading Democratic journal of the State, said July 25, 1883, about the time the Democratic convention was in session, touching the race issue. Let us see who raised it. I read an extract from an editorial in that paper, under date of July 25, 1883. Mark the language:

Before another issue of the Dispatch reaches the public the Lynchburgh convention—

“The Democratic convention then assembled—will in all probability have finished its work. The only matter of difference developed by a canvass of the delegations is regarding the advisability of drawing the color line.

This was a convention of the Democracy deploring race conflicts. The only difference of opinion was as to “the advisability of drawing the color line.” The Dispatch continues:

The Richmond delegation remain practically unanimous in the opinion that it should be drawn, and are, it will be seen, sustained by some of the strongest men of the party.

In order to draw the color line inflammatory circulars were issued by the Democratic party and scattered broadcast over the State with flaming head-line: “Coalition rule in Danville.”

Danville was selected as the scene for drawing the race issue by the Democracy, to be drawn, as the sequel shows, in blood. November 3 came. Three days before the election a Democratic club assembled in Danville, armed to the teeth with Winchester rifles. It was market day, Saturday afternoon. Colored people, men, women, and children, were at the market place. The streets were crowded. A white man, one of the “superior race,” without provocation, assaulted a black man in the public street, knocked him down, and two other gentlemen of the “superior race,” armed with bowie-knife and revolver, stood on either side to prevent any interference by officers or citizens. When the black man was sufficiently punished the fire-bell was rung, the alarm given, although there was no fire, and the Democratic club appeared upon the scene of action, raised the race issue, and fired into the crowd of black people, men, women, and children, as they were fleeing for their lives.

Armed Democrats took possession of the town. They succeeded in murdering four black men and mangling others. One man was shot, a helpless black man, as he sat in his cabin door, and the only excuse offered by the assassin was that he “wanted to try his pistol.” The officers of the law arrested another black man on the pretense that he had assaulted his wife on the street, with whom he was then in company, and though she insisted that she had not been assaulted by her husband they arrested and took him into an alley on pretense of bearing him to jail, and there butchered him. “The race issue” was drawn effectively. And then what? The people must be advised of it. The fruits of this dastardly outrage must be gathered. Telegrams were immediately sent to all Democratic clubs throughout the State that the negroes were waging a war of extermination upon the white people, and on Monday, only the day before the election, this startling announcement was telegraphed all over the State:

DANVILLE, November 5, 1883.

For God’s sake help us with your votes to-morrow. We are standing in our doors, shotgun in hand, trying to protect our families.

If you only knew our suffering here on account of negro rule you would vote different. We are standing in our doors with guns protecting our families. Post this up at the court-house door.

And again:

Riot in Danville. Mahoneism has worked its legitimate result in Danville. Riot and bloodshed have come to pass. Inflamed and crazed by the diabolical speeches which have been addressed to them by the Mahone nihilists, the negroes have precipitated the bloody issue. * * * People of the Valley and Southwest, the East calls upon you to come to its rescue, to help beat back the black wave which threatens to roll over us. Arouse ye and to the polls.

So the race issue was raised—raised by the Democratic party—and most effectively. Out of 1,200 registered colored voters in the city of Danville only 30 ventured to the polls; the remainder prudently remained away.

I think, therefore, I am justified in saying that the race issue is sometimes raised even by the Democratic party, which seems so deeply to deplore it, for the sole purpose of carrying elections.

Whenever in certain localities it is necessary to carry an election, when a great crime is to be perpetrated, when the ballot-box is to be rifled or stuffed, then the race issue is raised as an excuse for the outrage. A committee of the United States Senate appointed to investigate the affair made a report in which it was stated:

What, then, it is pertinent to inquire, was the condition of affairs in the city of Danville after the massacre and at the time these telegrams and reports were sent out? The Democrats came from the Opera House shouting and hallooing as they ran. They kept it up on their way up Main street until they reached the Arlington Hotel. They yelled in exultation, "Hurrah for us Democrats!" The signal bell for the people to fly to arms was sounded. The ringleaders in the massacre were placed on guard to patrol the city, as the mayor states, without his authority and without being sworn. Every white Democrat and even boys were armed, some with guns, others with pistols, and still others with bowie-knives. The white mob ruled the town.

Upon all the evidence it is clearly established it was a wanton, wicked, and groundless attack upon unoffending men, women, and children.

I submit, therefore, we should better not permit our judgment to be warped by the discussion of the race problem, but seriously address ourselves to the real question in hand.

What is it, in a word? It is this: Shall every legal voter in the Republic entitled to participate in the election of a Representative to the National Legislature have the opportunity to cast his ballot, and when cast shall that vote be honestly counted and the result truthfully declared? This is the whole question involved.

There ought to be but one answer to this question by all honest men. In your hearts there is but one answer.

In 1884 the great National Democratic party declared in its platform "we believe in a free ballot and a fair count." Were you honest in that declaration? If you were, you now have an opportunity to demonstrate your sincerity. All parties ought to be in accord upon this question. This bill may not secure the end desired; it may need amendment. If so, let it be modified. But all parties ought to unite in protecting and maintaining the sanctity of the ballot-box. It is the only safety of the Republic. This is a representative Government. All the people of the Republic can not assemble in mass convention to legislate for themselves. They must select Representatives to vote and speak for them. The ballot in the hand of the citizen is the badge of his sovereignty. Take that from him and he is a slave. Through the ballot, and that alone, he can make himself felt in the enactment of the laws and the administration of public affairs. It is as true to-day as it was a century ago that "all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed."

The President of the Argentine Republic, a Republic not supposed to be so far advanced in the science of government as ourselves, in a message to his Congress recently, said:

We should never forget—

And I wish gentlemen who juggle with ballot-boxes would write this sentiment in the palms of their hands—

We should never forget that when the public vote is tampered with representative governments exist but in name.

The President of the United States, in his inaugural address March 4, 1889, forcibly said:

It is very gratifying to observe the general interest now being manifested in the reform of our election laws. Those who have been for years calling attention to the pressing necessity of throwing about the ballot-box and about the elector further safeguards, in order that our elections might not only be free and pure, but might clearly appear to be so, will welcome the accession of any who did not so soon discover the need of reform. The national Congress has not as yet taken control of elections in that case over which the Constitution gives its jurisdiction, but has accepted and adopted the election laws of the several States, provided penalties for their violation and a method of supervision. Only the inefficiency of the State laws or an unfair or partisan administration of them could suggest a departure from this policy.

It was clearly, however, in the contemplation of the framers of the Constitution that such an exigency might arise, and provision was wisely made for it. The freedom of the ballot is a condition of our national life, and no power vested in Congress or in the Executive to secure or perpetuate it should remain unused upon occasion. The people of all the Congressional districts have an equal interest that the election of each shall truly express the views and wishes of a majority of the qualified electors residing within it. The results of such elections are not local, and the insistences of electors residing in other districts that they shall be pure and free does not savor at all of impertinence.

If in any of the States the public security is thought to be threatened by ignorance among the electors the obvious remedy is education. The sympathy and help of our people will not be withheld from any community struggling with special embarrassments or difficulties connected with the suffrage if the remedies proposed proceed upon lawful lines and are promoted by just and honorable methods. How shall those who practice election frauds recover that respect for the sanctity of the ballot which is the first condition and obligation of good citizenship? The man who has come to regard the ballot-box as a juggler's hat has renounced his allegiance.

There are but two questions involved in this controversy: Are elections for Representatives in Congress free and fair? and, secondly, if not, Does this bill provide the proper means to secure that end? Those are the only questions.

I shall not discuss the first proposition. That elections are free and fair in all portions of this country no one has the effrontery to affirm, and, if any one should so affirm, the evidence taken in the contested-election cases decided in this Congress would be a complete refutation.

If proof is necessary in addition to this, I will submit tables of election returns for twenty-five members from twenty-five Southern districts to the last Congress (and I take the last Congress that I may avoid personalities), showing they held their seats upon a vote of 94,841, less by 10,000 than the vote for Delegate from the Territory of Dakota, and yet every one of those twenty-five Democrats voted against the admission of Dakota upon the ground that she did not have sufficient population to entitle her to a Representative in Congress. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

From this table it appears that twenty-five gentlemen whose names were borne on the roll of membership of the last House, assuming to represent as many different districts, were elected substantially without opposition. In nine districts there was not a single dissenting vote, and in the remaining sixteen districts only a scattering vote ranging from 2 to 122 and aggregating but 407 votes in the whole twenty-five districts, while in none was there the slightest approach to any organized party antagonism. It is worthy of note in this connection that all these twenty-five Representatives were of one political faith—the adherents of the same political party—all Democrats. It is another significant fact that all these districts in which this unanimity exists are south of Mason and Dixon's line, while only one district in the North was carried without opposition, the Third district of Pennsylvania, lately represented by Hon. Samuel J. Randall. Who believes elections are fair or free in these twenty-five districts? I can name you twenty-five members of the last House who had back of them a vote of 1,063,780, while these Southern members represented a vote of only 95,245.

I will insert here a series of tables showing how the Republican and opposition vote in these twenty-five districts has been gradually but effectively wiped out. In 1880 the opposition vote to the Democratic party was 156,330; in 1882, 100,489; in 1884, 87,749, and in 1886 only 407 votes.

A free ballot and a fair count!

Mr. STEPHENSON. Great reformation.

Mr. BURROWS. Great reformation, as my friend suggests, in that section of the country. Where has this opposition vote gone? Take the Republican vote alone. In 1880 it was in round numbers 141,000 in those districts; in 1882 it was 61,000; in 1884 it was 85,000, and in 1886 it was just 28 votes. What has become of this Republican vote? Has it gone to the Democratic party? No; for while in 1880 the Democratic vote was 306,000, in 1886 it was only 94,000.

Several Democratic MEMBERS. What became of the Democratic vote?

Mr. BURROWS. The Republican vote certainly did not go to the Democrats.

Mr. OATES. Where did the Democratic vote go to?

Mr. BURROWS. They did not vote; no occasion to vote. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] What is the necessity of voting in districts where there is no opposition? There were nine of these districts where there was no opposition, where it was perfectly unanimous. In the other districts there were only two where a single vote was cast, 11 in one and 17 in the other, and that was all; and yet you tell us it was all quiet and peaceable. No doubt of that. So is a cemetery quiet. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Gentlemen, I hope the historian will not be compelled to declare of you as Tacitus wrote of the Romans:

To harass, to despoil, and to butcher, you style government. You make a solitude, and call it peace.

But they say this measure is unconstitutional. That is the standing Democratic objection. So was the old supervisors' law passed twenty years ago pronounced unconstitutional. I remember a distinguished Senator from Indiana [Senator VOORHEES], when that measure was under discussion, registered an oath before high heaven, as we have heard oaths registered in this debate, that he would resist the measure until he was carried to his grave before he would permit it to pass. Nevertheless, he lives, the measure passed, and the Supreme Court have repeatedly declared it constitutional. So this measure will be pronounced constitutional. This bill does no more than to place over the whole Congressional district the same machinery now in use in cities of 20,000 inhabitants. If constitutional when applied to cities of 20,000, it is constitutional for an entire Congressional district.

The proposed changes are few. The supervisors can swear a voter who is challenged for delay. Three supervisors of opposite political parties are to be appointed instead of two. If the poll is not opened after one hour the supervisors may open it and receive the Congressional vote. The position of the boxes shall not be changed during the voting. The boxes shall be in open view and accessible to the voter; the box shall not be removed from the polling place until the vote is counted, and some other changes which do not involve any principle which the Supreme Court has not already passed upon.

This measure further declares it to be a crime in connection with elections to commit perjury, make false certificate or return, practice any fraud connected therewith, stuff a ballot-box, steal ballots from a box, to bribe a voter, to offer to bribe, to hire a voter not to vote, to bribe or offer to bribe an election officer, to bribe any registration officer, to intimidate a voter, to change ballot-boxes, to count falsely, to hinder voters from voting, to make false registration, to make false naturalization, to hinder registration, to vote more than once at the same election, to hinder or interfere with an election officer, to willfully exclude the vote of a lawful voter, or do any other act or thing which will prevent a free ballot and a fair count. And yet, though the whole purpose of this measure is to secure a free and fair election, the Democratic party cry out against it and denounce it as unconstitutional and revolutionary.

I firmly believe if we were to strike out every word in this bill after the enacting clause and insert three of the Ten Commandments:

Thou shalt not steal;
Thou shalt not bear false witness;
Thou shalt not kill—the whole Democratic party would declare it an assault upon the South, subversive of the Constitution, and an infringement of the reserved rights of the States. [Applause on the Republican side.]

It is repeatedly asserted that under the Constitution we have no power to "make or alter" the regulations to the extent proposed by this bill. What says the Supreme Court:

The clause of the Constitution under which the power of Congress, as well as that of the State Legislatures, to regulate the election of Senators and Representatives arises is as follows:

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

It seems to us that the natural sense of these words is the contrary of that assumed by the counsel of the petitioners. After first authorizing the States to prescribe the regulations, it is added, "The Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations." "Make or alter." What is the plain meaning of these words? If not under the prepossession of some abstract theory of the relations between the State and the National Government, we should not have any difficulty in understanding them. There is no declaration that the regulations shall be made either wholly by the State Legislatures or wholly by Congress. If Congress does not interfere, of course they may be made wholly by the State; but if it chooses to interfere, there is nothing in the words to prevent its doing so, either wholly or partially. On the contrary their necessary implication is that they may do either. It may either make the regulations or it may alter them. If it only alters, leaving, as manifest convenience requires, the general organization of the polls to the State, there results a necessary co-operation of the two governments in regulating the subject.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] is apprehensive that where the regulations of the State and the National Government conflict trouble will ensue. The Supreme Court relieves the gentleman's fears.

But no repugnance in the system of regulations can arise thence, for the power of Congress over the object is paramount. It may be exercised as and when Congress sees fit to exercise it. When exercised, the action of Congress, so far as it extends and conflicts with the regulations of the State, necessarily supercedes them.

The objection, so often repeated, that such an application of Congressional regulations to those previously made by a State would produce a clashing of jurisdictions and a conflict of rules, loses sight of the fact that the regulations made by Congress are paramount to those made by the State Legislature; and if they conflict therewith, the latter, so far as the conflict extends, cease to be operative. No clashing can possibly arise.

The State may make regulations on the subject; Congress may make regulations on the same subject or may alter or add to those already made. The paramount character of those made by Congress has the effect to supersede those made by the State, so far as the two are inconsistent, and no further.

But we are warned that the presence of two sets of officers at the polls will certainly produce personal conflicts. Again, the Supreme Court points out how that may be avoided:

As to the supposed conflict that may arise between the officers appointed by the State and National Governments for superintending the election, no more insuperable difficulty need arise than in the application of the regulations adopted by each respectively. The regulations of Congress being constitutionally paramount, the duties imposed thereby upon the officers of the United States, so far as they have respect to the same matters, must necessarily be paramount to those to be performed by the officers of the State. If both can not be performed the latter are pro tanto superseded and cease to be duties.

Where there is a disposition to act harmoniously there is no danger of disturbance between those who have different duties to perform. When the rightful authority of the General Government is once conceded and acquiesced in, the apprehended difficulties will disappear. Let a spirit of national as well as local patriotism once prevail, let unfounded jealousies cease, and we shall hear no more about the impossibility of harmonious action between the National and State Governments in a matter in which they have a mutual interest.

But it is said this is a new exercise of power, never heretofore invoked. In 1842 Congress, by statute, required members of the House of Representatives to be elected from districts, and subsequently fixed the time for holding the election and provided it should be by ballot. Because a power has lain dormant it does not therefore follow that it does not exist. Because it sleeps it is not dead.

But some gentlemen say this measure will produce trouble in some of the Southern States. Why trouble? Obey the law and there will be no trouble. Let me invoke the language of the Supreme Court on that question, and it is a lesson some gentlemen would do well to learn:

The greatest difficulty in coming to a just conclusion arises from mistaken notions with regard to the relations which subsist between the State and the National Government. It seems to be often overlooked that a national constitution has been adopted in this country establishing a real government therein, operating upon persons and territory and things, and which, moreover, is, or should be, as dear to every American citizen as the State government is. Whenever the true conception of the nature of this government is once conceded, no real difficulty will arise in the just interpretation of its powers. But if we allow ourselves to regard it—as a hostile organization, opposed to the proper sovereignty and dignity of the State governments, we shall continue to be vexed with difficulties as to its jurisdiction and authority.

The true interest of the people of this country requires that both the National and State Governments should be allowed, without jealous interference on either side, to exercise all the powers which respectively belong to them according to a fair and practical construction of the Constitution. State rights and the rights of the United States should be equally respected. Both are essential to the preservation of our liberties and the prosperity of our institutions. But, in endeavoring to vindicate the one, we should not allow our zeal to nullify or impair the other.

But you say, let us alone and these evils of which you complain will correct themselves. If only State government was involved we might yield to the demand. If the people of your States are willing to be dominated by an oligarchy, and submit to a government of fraud and violence, that is a matter that concerns the State, and the National Government can only interfere when called upon to guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government. In the mean time, however, how about the elections of Representatives to this National Legislature clothed with power to make laws for all the people of all the States? The National Government has the right to say something about that. The Supreme Court forcibly says:

It is the duty of the States to elect Representatives to Congress. The due and fair election of these Representatives is of vital importance to the United States. The Government of the United States is no less concerned in the transaction than the State government is. It certainly is not bound to stand by as a passive spectator when duties are violated and outrageous frauds are committed.

If the people of any of the States are content to submit to the domination of a class and be ruled by officials who were never elected, the National Government can not afford to submit to such subversion of representative government.

But you say there are frauds North. Granted. If there is a single fraud perpetrated on the ballot-box anywhere, from Maine to California, from the Gulf to the Lakes, amend this bill to cover every conceivable instance, if you can, and it shall receive my cordial support. If there is any provision in this bill that oversteps the bounds of constitutional restraint, strike it down; but let us stand together in maintaining a free ballot and a fair count everywhere throughout the Republic.

Without it the Republic can not stand. Let it be once understood that the will of the people, as expressed at the ballot-box, can not be recorded and that the Government under which they live is not their Government, but one of fraud and violence, and the people will be ripe for revolution, and revolution will surely come. The ballot-box is the very sanctuary of the sovereignty of the American people.

This country can endure the fiercest political contests known to party warfare; it can withstand the machinations of the anarchist; foreign armies may invade and desolate it; hostile fleets may hang upon its shores, bombard its cities, and lay tribute upon its people; fratricidal war may shake its foundations and deluge it in blood; yet, if we but preserve the sovereignty of the people unimpaired as expressed at the ballot-box, the Republic will endure and come out of the conflict stronger, purer, and more invincible for the trial. [Applause on the Republican side.] These crimes upon the suffrage of a free people must cease.

I feel deeply on this question. I have no excuse to offer for any man who violates the sanctity of the ballot-box. It is the crime of crimes in a free government. When I put my ballot in the box, no mortal man has the right to touch it except to record my verdict. To destroy it, I repeat, is the crime of crimes, and it must cease or the Republic will fall. Why, sir, I would rather history should record that in the unhappy conflict of 1861-1865, in the clash of arms for the struggle for great convictions and great ideas, the Republic had fallen and been blotted from the map of empire than that it should be recorded that after it had been preserved, at such a sacrifice of blood and treasure, public virtue at last decayed and it fell through the corruption of the people. Better for us as a nation, better for history. I had rather you had taken this Government in 1861 by force than to take it now by fraud.

I can forgive a man who, in a moment of passion or in the hour of revolution, fires upon his country's flag. But that man who in peace crawls to a ballot-box where reposes the latest-born offspring of a nation's sovereign will and takes its life is an assassin whose crime can not be expiated. [Loud applause on the Republican side.] Tear down a nation's flag and you destroy only the symbol of sovereignty; destroy the ballots of a free people and you assassinate the sovereign itself. In the presence of such a crime treason itself almost whitens into a virtue.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Has not your Administration just appointed such a man as you describe an officer in the Treasury Department?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan declines to be interrupted.

Mr. BURROWS. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO] the other day said:

Do not pass this bill, vote it down, and then we can go home to the people and cry "Liberty; liberty."

Liberty to do what? Liberty to make false registration; liberty to stuff and rifle ballot-boxes; liberty to make false certificates; liberty to murder; liberty to overthrow the sovereignty of the people and install an oligarchy on the ruins. Heaven deliver us from such liberty as that. Let us rather pass some measure that will give to every lawful voter in the Republic the opportunity to cast his ballot and have that ballot honestly counted, and then we may return to our homes and proclaim to all the people the immortal words of the martyred Lincoln: "A government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from the earth." [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

CONTINUANCE OF APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all appropriations for the necessary operations of the Government, and of the District of Columbia, under existing laws, which shall remain unprovided for on the 30th day of June, 1890, be, and they are hereby, continued and made available for a period of thirty days from and after that date unless the regular appropriations provided therefor in bills now pending in Congress shall have been previously made for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891; and a sufficient amount is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry on the same: Provided, That no greater amount shall be expended for such operations than will be in the same proportion to the appropriations for the fiscal year 1890 as thirty days' time bears to the whole of said fiscal year: Provided further, That the total expenditures for the whole of the fiscal year 1891 under the several appropriations hereby continued shall not exceed in the aggregate the amounts finally appropriated therefor in the several bills now pending, except in cases where a change is made in the annual, monthly, or per diem compensation, or in the numbers of officers, clerks, or other persons authorized to be employed by the several appropriations hereby continued, in which cases the amounts authorized to be expended shall equal thirty three-hundred-and-sixty-fifths of the appropriations for the fiscal year 1890, and three-hundred-and-thirty-five three-hundred-and-sixty-fifths of the appropriation contained in the several bills now pending when the same shall have finally passed, unless the salary or compensation of any office shall be increased or diminished without changing the grade or the duties thereof, in which case such salary or compensation shall relate to the entire fiscal year and run from the beginning thereof.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, does this come up by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. SPRINGER. Under the rules all appropriations should go to the Committee on Appropriations and also be considered in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman make the point of order that it should go to the Committee of the Whole? If so, I will move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire first to make the point that it is not in order to introduce this joint resolution in the House at this time, making appropriations for the support of the Government, and to consider it here immediately. It must receive its first consideration in the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman makes the point of order, although this is the last day of the fiscal year, he can do so, and we will discuss it. If he does not make the point of order, I suppose that inside of two minutes this joint resolution, which is substantially the same resolution that has been passed every other year at the long session for many years, will be passed. The gentleman, however, can pursue his own course.

Mr. SPRINGER. If this joint resolution is not to take up time and can be gotten rid of at once I have no objection to its consideration, but as the time has been limited for the discussion of the pending bill and as this is the time assigned for that specific purpose, I object to anything else being brought in to consume the only time which, under the special order brought in here by the Committee on Rules, is available for the discussion of the election bill.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman can pursue his own course. I have stated my own opinion to be that unless there is objection, in two minutes this joint resolution can be passed. If there should be objection, of course we will discuss the force of that objection, and, as I have said, the gentleman can pursue his own course.

Mr. SPRINGER. I want to call attention to the fact that notwithstanding we have had rules adopted at this session for the purpose of facilitating the transaction of business, as we were told by gentlemen on the other side, still we find ourselves at the end of the fiscal year, with not a single appropriation bill passed. Now under the statement of my colleague from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that this joint resolution will not occupy any considerable time, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] is mistaken. The Army bill and the Naval Academy bill have been laws since the 20th of June.

Mr. MORROW. And the pension bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I should like to hear some statement of the necessity for this.

Mr. CANNON. The present condition of the appropriation bills is as follows: The following appropriation bills are laws or in the hands of the President for approval and likely to be laws before midnight: The Army appropriation bill, the Military Academy appropriation bill, the naval appropriation bill, the pension bill, and the post-office bill. The District of Columbia appropriation bill is agreed on in conference and awaiting confirmation of the conference report. In conference are: The diplomatic and consular bill, the fortification bill, and the legislative bill. I hope that before midnight the District of Columbia bill, the diplomatic and consular bill, and the legislative bills will have become laws. Pending in the Senate is the river and harbor bill. The agricultural bill has been passed to-day. Pending before the Committee on Appropriations in the Senate are the sundry civil bill and the Indian bill.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Where is the deficiency bill?

Mr. CANNON. The deficiency bill to make up for the deficiencies of this fiscal year has not yet been reported.

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. MCOMAS. Let me add that the chances are that the agricultural bill which is now being considered will be followed by the District bill in the course of an hour or two.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to submit a statement showing the condition of the appropriation bills now as compared with their condition at this time two years ago. I will not occupy the time of the House in reading, but will ask leave to print.

There was no objection.

Mr. DOCKERY. The following was the condition of appropriation bills June 30, 1888:

Laws: Indian; Military Academy; pension.
In conference: Agricultural; diplomatic and consular; District of Columbia; legislative, executive, and judicial; Post-Office.
Pending in the Senate: Army; river and harbor.
Pending in Senate Committee on Appropriations: Navy; sundry civil.
Not reported to the House: Fortification.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to contrast the present condition of the general appropriation bills with their status at the corresponding period in the Fiftyth Congress, for the reason that during the last six months we have been operating under a system of rules which it was claimed would expedite the business of the House. Of the appropriation bills, only the Army and Military Academy bills have become laws; the pension appropriation bill went to the President this morning, whilst the naval and Post-Office appropriation bills will probably reach the President to-morrow. The District of Columbia appropriation bill, which passed the House with such extraordinary haste in December last, has just been agreed on in conference and will probably be presented to the House before the close of the day's session. There are now in conference the diplomatic and consular bills, the fortification bill, and the legislative, executive, and judicial bill. The agricultural and river and harbor bills are pending in the Senate, whilst the sundry civil and Indian appropriation bills have not yet been reported to the Senate by the Senate Committee on Appropriations. It is thus manifest, Mr. Speaker, that the new rules have not operated to expedite the passage of the general appropriation bills.

Mr. CANNON. I have got it here and will read it for the gentleman, if he wishes; or, if the gentleman desires, I will put it in the RECORD.

Mr. DOCKERY. No, I will put it in myself. I have leave to do so. Mr. CANNON. I have no objection to the gentleman putting it in, but I will put it in also, if there be no objection.

There was no objection.

The statement is as follows:

Condition of appropriation bills June 30, 1888.

Laws: Indian; Military Academy; pension.
In conference: Agricultural; diplomatic and consular; District of Columbia; legislative, executive, and judicial; Post-Office.
Pending in the Senate: Army; river and harbor.
Pending in Senate Committee on Appropriations: Navy; sundry civil.
Not reported to the House: Fortification.

Condition of appropriation bills June 30, 1890.

Laws or in hands of President for approval: Army; Military Academy; Navy; pension; Post-Office.
Agreed on in conference: District of Columbia.
In conference: Diplomatic and consular; fortification; legislative, executive, and judicial.
Passed the Senate to-day: Agricultural.
Pending in the Senate: River and harbor.
Pending in the Senate Committee on Appropriations: Indian; sundry civil.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

FEDERAL ELECTION LAW.
